THE Brazilian rebellion, on its land side, still shows signs of somewhat vigorous life.

THE French Chamber of Deputies has voted confidence in Premier Dupuy by a vote of 369 to 60.

P. E. PRENDERGAST, the murderer of Carter H. Harrison, was hanged in Chicago on July 13th.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL has been appointed chief justice of England, in place of Lord Coleridge, deceased.

NEW YORK'S rapid transit commission has approved the plans of former boards for an underground road.

THE new labor party in England will probably weaken the Liberal party and bring the Tories into power.

EVA-MANN-BRILL-STEELE-GAUL-HAMILTON has for $10,000 relinquished her claim on the estate of Robert Ray Hamilton.

THE electric line to connect New York and Philadelphia seems likely to be built in the near future. It will utilize seventy miles of local roads.

THE Illinois Labor conference demanded the free coinage of silver and unlimited legal tender, nationalization of railways, telegraphs, mines, etc.

EARTHQUAKES hav recently shaken portions of Turkey and Japan, causing considerable loss of life in Constantinople and in Tokio and Yokohama.

THE nativ princes of India are marrying European wives. With the nativ states governed by Eurasian rulers, the political question will put on a new phase.

THE Louisiana legislature, by a unanimous vote, made an appropriation for a statue for a negro—Thomas Lafor—who at death left nearly $600,000 to charity.

THE positions of the Democratic and Republican parties, on the silver question, is Populistic, in many states, if judged by the platforms of the state conventions.

JAPAN and China are likely to become involved in war over the disputes concerning matters in Corea. Russia is said also to hav designs for the acquisition of Corea.

THE straight Democrats of Kansas nominated David Overmeyer for governor. The platform demands the resubmission of the prohibitory amendment and opposes woman suffrage.

THE Federal court, sitting at Henderson, Ky., has declared the separate coach law of that state unconstitutional. This law provided that all trains should hav special cars for negroes.

LOUISIANA negroes hav organized bands of black cappers to defend themselvs against the white cappers. As the Galveston News says, "the criminal who takes the law into his own hand usually meets his match."

ABDUL HAMID KHAN, sultan of Turkey, has conferred the order "Chefakat" upon Mrs. Charles Henrotin, vice-president of the Woman's Branch Auxiliary of the Columbian Exposition. He declares that woman is legally the equal of man in all Mussulman communities.

ERASTUS WIMAN, convicted of forgery and sentenced to states prison, is out on bail, Justice Barrett thinking there is a "reasonable doubt" in his favor, and so granting a stay of execution. The bail bond is for $30,000, and is signed by Charles Broadway Rouss.

NEGRO miners at Birmingham, Ala., were shot down by strikers as they came from their work. Four volleys from Winchesters were poured into them. Ten were known to be killed, and several wounded. Many more are supposed to be dead. The militia had just been withdrawn.

THE caisson of a Hotchkiss gun of Battery F, Second Artillery, U. S. army, exploded while the battery and cavalry troops were taking exercise march in Chicago on July 16, and four soldiers were killed, fifteen soldiers and civilians wounded. Seven horses were torn to pieces.

A BILL has been introduced in the French Chamber of Deputies to abolish the penalties which the wife has hitherto been liable to for marital offenses. Alexander Dumas favors the measure, saying: "Once we hav divorce, marital infidelity should simply be looked upon as a violation of a civil contract, which marriage is. As this violation finds its condemnation in the rupture of the contract, where is the need for supplementary penalties? They are not only useless, but unjust."

THE railway strike, although not yet officially declared off, seems at this writing to be practically dead. It is comparativly quiet in Chicago, and the railroads are getting into fairly good running shape again. On Sunday at Indianapolis thirty cars of the Pennsylvania, standing on an inclined switch, were cut loose and sent down at terrific speed into the stables of a brewing company, destroying wagons and slaughtering horses. At many points in the country attempts, several of them successful, hav been made to derail trains. The first mail train out of Sacramento, guarded by soldiers, was precipitated into a slough by the sawing of the supports of a trestle, and the engineer and four soldiers were killed. Much mail was lost. California fruit raisers hav suffered enormous losses, and now the Northwestern farmers are apprehensiv of ruin through failure to get binding twine in time. Northern Pacific switchmen hav again gone out. Engineer Martin, a non-union man, who brought through the first train on that road since the strike began, was shot in the Bad Lands of Montana. His fireman was also murdered. It is reported that a committee of the Minnesota Farmers' Alliance has offered provisions and money to the A. R. U. Last week Debs offered to officially call the strike off if the railway managers would promis to take back all their old men who had not been guilty of violence. The proposition was not considered, so the strike is still in force. Mr. Pullman has made a statement, claiming that owing to hard times business was so dull that contracts for cars were taken at very low figures rather than close the shops. At the conference in Chicago of labor leaders it seems to hav been decided not to call out more workmen. Very few men, comparativly, responded to Sovereign's order to quit. It is generally thought that the cause of the sudden collapse of the strike was the refusal of the engineers and firemen and the Federation of Labor to join forces with the A. R. U. But the ultimate outcome would, in all likelihood, hav been the same, even if these organizations had struck, for the presence of the troops, insuring new men against violent interference, would hav kept trains running. The press of the country, with the exception, of course, of the Populist, is practically a unit, irrespectiv of party, in sustaining President Cleveland. The papers of the South, the home of the states right idea, repudiate Governor Altgeld's interpretation of it, claiming that the carrying of mails and the prosecution of interstate commerce, including the transportation of passengers, are matters of national rather than of local concern. The strikers and their supporters claim that the state and national governments invariably side with the corporations, to which it is replied that courts intervene and troops are called out to protect the rights of all the people by enabling the railroads to peacefully serve the public, if they can get men to work, and to protect those men from violence when working. The United States Senate, by a practically unanimous vote, expresses its confidence in President Cleveland, holding that he has acted wholly within the law in all that he has done in this crisis. President Cleveland will appoint a committee of investigation, under the Arbitration act of 1888, of which Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, will, according to the provisions of that law, be chairman. This committee has no power to arbitrate and cannot investigate the trouble between Pullman and his men, as shop work is not interstate commerce. It will deal only with the strike as it affected the transportation of mails and continental commerce. The president makes it a condition of the appointment of this committee that all violent resistance to authority shall first cease. Labor leaders are trying to secure the impeachment of Attorney-General Olney for the advice given to the president and instructions to United states marshals. During the trouble several G. A. R. posts offered their services to the governors of their states. Cattle and hogs in transit hav suffered terribly, many perishing. Ex-Governor Hoadley, of Ohio (who, by the way, is a Freethinker), and other leading constitutional lawyers, say that the president has strictly obeyed the law. Several very large meetings in sympathy with the strikers hav been held in New York. It is stated that the Pullman employees, tired of unprofitable idleness, asked Debs to make the proposition he did to the railway managers. President McBride, of the United Mine Workers, said he could not order out its men; only the executiv board could do that. The Union Pacific employees refused to strike in aid of Debs. They say that they are in honor bound not to do so, for they were perfectly satisfied with the very liberal terms of Judge Caldwell. His decision, they say, was the greatest victory for organized labor ever achieved on this continent. Judge Grosscup, in Chicago, and Judge Morrow, in San Francisco, hav instructed United States juries that the agreement of two or more men to prevent the dispatch of mail trains is conspiracy under the law, and applies impartially to railway officials, strikers, and rioters. Railway officers who stopped running mail trains on their roads when not under stress of actual violence will therefore be liable to trial and punishment.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Journal of Freethought and Reform.

Vol. 21. No. 30 {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, July 28, 1894. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 Per Year

THE KIND OF GOVERNMENT THE RELIGIONISTS BELIEVE IN.

VOICE OF THE SKY PILOT: "If you don't like our laws you can leave the country."

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies will soon adjourn, but the people of the country will remain in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

Mr. Putnam is traveling around gathering up experiences. He has been philosophically observing social convulsions, humorously questioning Mrs. de Lespinasse's table, studying horticulture in Michigan, investigating copper mining, drinking of the waters of life, and in other ways adding to his already large store of useful knowledge and robust vitality. Meanwhile "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is being pushed toward completion, and we still offer THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the book for $6.50. Those wanting only "Four Hundred Years" can get it for $5, and in both cases the cash subscriber's name will appear among those of the other original patrons. Why Freethinkers Oppose a Theocracy.

There are some very radical people, themselvs rejecting all dogmas of superstition, who cannot understand why Freethinkers should engage in Freethought propaganda, or combat the political schemes of the church. They often express their contempt for distinctiv secularistic work, being frequently met at the Manhattan Liberal Club, and in other gatherings where addresses antagonistic to the dominant religion and to theocratic machinations are delivered. They are also in evidence in the columns of journals devoted to economic and industrial reform, representing all divisions of the army of agitation, ranging from extreme Collectivism to extreme Individualism. Many of them assume to be very scientific, apparently recognizing, in their more general arguments, the fundamental principle of growth or social development. As students of history they cannot fail to see that the progressiv march of man, like that of all other organisms, is painfully slow and devious. Little by little he has advanced, dropping each century or decade some atom of the imperfect old and taking up an atom of the less imperfect new. Even what we call revolutions hav been merely pulse-beats of evolution, and they were rendered possible only by long preparatory embryonic educativ periods during which impulse and thought ripened into action —action often almost wholly insane, never entirely sane.

These friends who are of us and yet not with us in our special liberalizing work are seemingly—judging their thoughts by their utterances—oblivious to many truths that to us appear self-evident. In spite of their assumed acquaintance with the fundamental principle of evolution, and their self-asserted use of scientific methods, they ignore many glaringly palpable facts. They forget that they are the intellectual children of the dead Freethinkers. Only to a limited extent are they the architects of their own mental fortunes. The blazing torches of religious liberty in whose light they so indifferently walk were lit at martyr fires. Their own opportunities and happiness are immeasurably limited because of the fact that hundreds of millions of their fellows yet grope in the caverns of gross superstition. The study of every social problem is hindered and misdirected by the survival of animistic conceptions. And human volition is now the chief factor of human development. Brains must be emancipated. Men and women who sit and shiver in the dark shadows of the priest-cursed past can be of no help to the race, save as fearful examples, and we need not be apprehensiv that we shall cut down the supply of such below the danger line. There will always be plenty and to spare of these worthless camp followers. We must, as a matter of self-preservation, free every mind we can from the fear of priest and devil, hell and God.

It is folly to say that there is no danger, that the battle against superstition per se and against superstition intrenched in proscriptiv law is won. It is simply amazing that anyone who knows aught of the constitution of the mind, who has studied heredity and recognizes the fact of fixity of type, who knows that the virus of supernaturalism has been in the blood of the race for tens of thousands of years, who realizes that the fires of persecution sent the tainted currents surging through the veins and arteries of our ancestors and fixed the terrible image of Fear in the centers of consciousness—it is amazing, we repeat, that any intelligent person who knows all this can fail to understand what it implies, can be so credulous and optimistic as to believe that a few hundred years of weak propaganda, which has touched only a small fraction of the human family, can hav neutralized the poison of anti-naturalism and paralyzed the sword-arm of the church militant. He must be blind who cannot perceive the tremendous influence which this maleficent authority exerts. It is yet powerful in the domain of belief; socially and morally it terrorizes millions, and it shapes legislation in many directions. Some of the greatest abuses of civil power, abuses against which our disaffected friends never cease to declaim, are directly due to its initiativ, and many others are indirectly inspired by the same malign spirit. All human institutions come from the minds of the people, and it is a waste of effort to attempt to abolish hurtful customs, systems, and statutes while the brains of their creators remain incapable of perceiving their useless or destructiv character. Improvements in government and society cannot precede, but, at most, are synchronous with the intellectual and ethical quickening of those who hav created or sustain the one and compose the other. No evil will be destroyed until those who hav the power to destroy it recognize it as an evil and are pushed into action by the desire to terminate its existence. The individual is primary, and until a controling number of individuals escape from the influence of the church the bad customs and institutions fostered by the church will continue to dwarf, pervert, oppress, and destroy.

A Western editorial correspondent of one of our city contemporaries finds a mystery in the fact that the Morse-Frye proposed amendment has "aroused the ire" of the Freethinkers. He says, that "since the idea of government is derived from the idea of God, it is but appropriate that the latter should receive official recognition from the former," and he then proceeds to quote from the Civilta Catolica of Rome in order to show that the Catholics are more logical than the Freethinkers, because the Catholics assume that loss of belief in God is responsible for the political and other assassinations which hav lately convulsed continental Europe. The Civilta Catolica and our contemporary's correspondent hav between them made a queer mess of it. In the first place, the correspondent has put the two-wheeled vehicle before the equine quadruped. It is certain that there has never been anything in the fancy-heaven of religion that did not hav its prototype on earth, in germ, at least. Instead of the idea of government being derived from God, the idea of God, as a ruler, was derived from the fact of government, in one or many of its multiform manifestations. It is, of course, true that subsequently the heavenly monarch was presumed to hav appointed and anointed his subordinates on earth, but the question is not now one regarding the modern development of a primitiv concept. It is the issue of derivation which the correspondent has raised, and he has undoubtedly reversed the historical order.

The correspondent naturally wishes to make it appear that it is absurd for Freethinkers to attempt to keep God out of government when, as he claims, and no doubt thinks, the idea of government had its source in the idea of God. He says: "By all means put God in the Constitution. Yes, and keep him there." Not only is it not true that the idea of King God antedated the fact of earthly government, but it is also true that the framers of the Constitution repudiated the divinity-of-the-king theory which, as we hav stated, was a later transformation of the primitiv concept, and, as Ingersoll has pithily said, they "retired the gods from politics." The American idea was and is that there should be no union of the religious and civil organizations. The clearest minds of the revolutionary era were satisfied that the combination of the two forces weakened whatever potentialities for good both might possess when separate, and they knew that their alliance had been the cause of an infinit amount of positiv harm to every people who had been ruled by the two jointly. So it was determined to cut off from government the divine adjunct and leave to the individual the solution of theological problems and to him and his God the settlement of all difficulties that might arise between them. Government was to confine its attention to purely worldly affairs. Such, in brief, is the secular theory of politics. Freethinkers are practically a unit in considering this arrangement a vast improvement on all that preceded it and on all competing schemes which contemplate the retention of even the smallest, most fragil, link in the bloody chain of church-state union.

It could easily be admitted without in the least weakening the secular position that all that the ablest enemies of civil government say against it is wholly true. If government has its place as a defensiv power it will be helpful in the ratio that it confines itself to the performance of its legitimate duties. Thus there is every incentiv urging us to prevent its attempting the task of teaching religion and enforcing obedience to the theological notions concerning health, morality, and sociology entertained by the victims of Christian and Theistic cults. If, on the other hand, government is inherently, entirely, and ineradicably an evil, so much the more reason for curtailing its functions and limiting the field of operations of its officials. In either case, the attitude of the Freethinker is sanctioned by common sense, prudence, and true statesmanship. Whatever view anyone may take of the essential nature of the state, and how few or many the undertakings in which he holds it may rightfully engage, it cannot be questioned that it would be criminally foolish to add to the admitted wrongs inseparable from or incidentally associated with the administration of law the immeasurable evil of state interpretation of religious creeds and state supervision of belief. This is what the pending Christian amendment implies, intends, and portends.

We are not unmindful of the fact that such considerations as those here advanced hav no weight with a few sanguin iconoclasts. They are not striving for a reform, or for many small successiv reforms. They are looking for a cataclysm. They do not wish—at least they do not expect—to eliminate one by one the imperfections and inequities of society and of government. They anticipate the continued accretion of social and governmental evils until such time as the whole system shall become so overloaded that it will break down by its own weight and a storm of moral wrath and physical destruction will sweep over the civilized world, burying the old and creating a new social order. The history of the nations and the present intellectual and ethical status of the peoples do not, in our opinion, justify such a forecast. It is indeed well to keep our goal far in advance and above, but however distant and elevated it may be, we shall approach it only by short, slow, and, perhaps, very infrequent steps. We must seize and hold every inch of ground that we can. Only thus can sure advance be made. Keep the church out of the seats of power, and by so doing make more easy the mental liberation of her adherents. She cannot do serious harm now unless backed by statutes and bayonets. See to it that she receives no more such backing and that what she already has be withdrawn. Stand by the Freethought principle of absolute separation of ecclesiasticism and politics, no matter who attacks it openly nor what pretended friends try to ally you with this or that faction of its enemies.

We can still supply THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 9th, containing the copyrighted addresses of Colonel Ingersoll, T. B. Wakeman, and Henry Rowley, and others delivered at the Paine Memorial celebration at New Rochelle, May 30th. Cambridge Past and Present.

Poor old moribund Massachusetts! It has always been her misfortune to be under the thumbs of the preachers. In the early days they owned the unfortunate colony, and they cling to their waning power with the tenacity of despair. Only the other day the ministers of Cambridge demanded that an old Sunday ordinance should be enforced. It had previously fallen into desuetude, but it is never prudent to assume that such desuetude is innocuous or that it is permanent. Bad laws should be repealed. Well, Mayor Bancroft had to obey; he recognized his masters, as we all shall eventually if we do not soon bury this monstrosity of political ecclesiasticism in the dishonorable grave which its foul offenses make its only fit destination. All drug stores in Cambridge were closed; no one could get a cigar, a glass of soda water, a grain of medicin, or a newspaper, in the minister-misruled village on the priests' workday. Some of the notices in the drug store windows were humorous, some sarcastic. One said:

"This store will not be open on Sunday until further notice. Buy your Sunday papers at the car station in Bowdoin Square. Cigars, soda, and candy in Somerville. Per order of the mayor."

"Sick people hold over until Monday," one placard read. Another druggist fell into slang at the end of his notice, intimating his weariness with clerical meddling:

"We would gladly furnish our customers with a glass of soda, a cigar, a pill, or dose of rhubarb, but the law says no. If you will kindly wait until to-morrow, we will try to serve you better than ever before. Giv us a rest."

Massachusetts needs another tea party. Clergymen are usually conspicuous at such "functions," and at this they should be very numerously represented.

Cambridge is true to its traditions. The upas-tree planted in 1637 still exhales deadly poison in 1894. In his admirable work, "Massachusetts: Its Historians and Its History," Charles Francis Adams tells in terse and vigorous English the story of her shame. He says:

"The story opens with the contested charter election of 1637, as a result of which Governor John Winthrop replaced Governor Sir Henry Vane as chief executiv of the colony. This election took place in the open air upon what is now Cambridge Common, on the 27th day of May. Four months later it was followed by the gathering of the first Synod of Massachusetts churches, which again, meeting here in Cambridge, doubtless held its sessions in the original meeting-house standing on what is now called Mount Auburn street. The Synod sat through twenty-four days, during which it busied itself unearthing heterodox opinions and making the situation uncomfortable for those suspected of heresy, until it had spread upon its record no less than eighty-two such 'opinions, some blasphemous, others erroneous, and all unsafe,' besides 'nine unwholesome expressions,' all alleged to be rife in the infant community. Having performed this feat, it broke up amid general congratulations 'that matters had been carried on so peaceably, and concluded so comfortably in all love.' Finally, here in Cambridge, also, and without doubt in the same meeting-house, took place the trial of the arch-heretic, Mistress Anne Hutchinson, and on the 18th of November, 1637, she was condemned to banishment.

"As the twig is bent, the tree inclines. The Massachusetts twig was here and then bent; and, as it was bent, it during hard upon two centuries inclined. The question of Religious Toleration was, so far as Massachusetts could decide it, decided in 1637 in the negativ. On that issue Massachusetts then definitly and finally renounced all claim or desire to head the advancing column, or even to be near the head of the column; it did not go to the rear, but it went well towards it, and there it remained until the issue was decided."

Unfortunately, the issue is not yet decided, and will not be while a handful of ministers are permitted to make statutes and ordinances for the people of the old commonwealth. The Cambridge clerics who hav just shown their power in the city which is the seat of Harvard University are animated by the identical spirit which dictated these infamous utterances of the "Simple Cobler of Aggawam in America" in 1647;

"My heart hath naturally detested foure things: · · · Tolerations of divers Religion, or of one Religion in segregant shapes: He that willingly assents to the last, if he examines his heart by day-light his conscience will tell him, he is either an Atheist, or an Heretique, or an Hypocrite, or at best a captive to some lust: Poly-piety is the greatest impiety in the world. · · · I lived in a City, where a Papist preached in one Church, a Lutheran in another, a Calvinist in a third; a Lutheran one part of the day, a Calvinist the other, in the same pulpit: the Religion of that place was but motley and meagre, their affections Leopardlike. · · · Concerning Tolerations I may further assert. That Persecution of True Religion, and Toleration of false, are the Jannes and Jambres to the kingdom of Christ, whereof the last is farre the worst. · · · It is said that Men ought to have Liberty of their Conscience, and that it is Persecution to debarre them of it: I can rather stand amazed than reply to this: it is an astonishment to think that the brains of men should be parboyl'd in such impious ignorance."

Said Thomas Shepard, Sr., first pastor of the church in Cambridge:

"To cut off the hand of the magistrate from touching men for their consciences will certainly in time (if it get ground) be the utter overthrow, as it is the undermining, of the Reformation begun. This opinion is but one of the fortresses and strongholds of Sathan, to keep his head from crushing by Christ's heele, who (forsooth) because he is krept into mens consciences, and because conscience is a tender thing, no man must here meddle with him, as if consciences were made to be the safeguard of sin and errour, and Sathan himself, if once they can creep into them."

Said Increase Mather, president of Harvard college from 1685 to 1701:

"I do believe that Antichrist hath not at this day a more probable way to advance his Kingdom of Darkness than by a Toleration of all Religions and Perswasions."

Who can say that the Cambridge of to-day is not faithful, judging her by her ministers and her ordinances, to the ignominious record of her early years? Her people of that time were afraid of the liberty-assassins of the church and it appears that her citizens of this decade are equally abject of spirit. How much longer will such edicts of intolerance libel their intelligence and sense of justice?

A Transparent Sham.

The Constitutional Convention Committee on Education has adopted this proposed section for the state constitution:

"Neither the state nor any sub-division thereof shall use its property or credit or any public money or authorize or permit either to be used, directly or indirectly, in aid or maintenance of schools or other institutions of learning wholly or partly under the direction or control of any religious denomination, or in which any denominational tenet or doctrin is taught."

This is the fruit of the work of the National League for the Protection of American Institutions. And very unwholesome fruit it is, tainted and unsound from rind to core. The Protestant churches hav managed well. The proposed amendment will, if adopted, cut off state money supplies from Catholic institutions, and will prevent the teaching in state-supported or state-aided schools of distinctiv Catholic doctrins. But that is all that it will do and all that it is intended to do. It will not prevent the teaching in such schools of distinctiv Protestant doctrins nor of the doctrins which Protestants and Catholics hold in common. It will not make secular the instruction given in the public schools. It will not prevent a combination of Protestant sects from running all the state-nourished schools they choose in the interest of their creed. Adopt this proposed amendment and it will still be perfectly easy to vote millions of dollars each year to assist schools in which every fundamental dogma of Christianity is inculcated. God worship, the mediatorship and kingship of Jesus, the fall of man, vicarious atonement, Bible idolatry—not one of these affirmations or acts of adoration or creedal fetiches is shut out of the schools by this amendment. None know this better than do the men who hav induced the Committee on Education to assent to the section and present it to the Convention. We fear that they understand it better even than do some much more liberal people. The scheme in its entirety was instigated and engineered by Protestant Jesuits for the one purpose of strengthening Protestantism and Theism by intrenching them in the organic law of the state.

These men insist that they are opposed to any union of church and state. Were they really so, this is the form of amendment they would hav urged upon the Constitutional Convention:

"Neither the state nor any sub-division thereof shall use its property or credit or any public money, or authorize or permit to be used, directly or indirectly, in aid or maintenance of schools or other institutions of learning, wholly or partly under the direction or control of any religious denomination or combination or family of denominations, or in which any religious or anti-religious tenet or doctrin is taught."

Every intelligent person will perceive at a glance the vital difference between this secular and the Protestant-Theistic amendment which we hav criticised.

The Prosecution of J. B. Wise.

The letters printed below will inform our readers regarding the present situation of J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas, indicted for sending through the mails to Rev. Mr. Vennum a postal card upon which was written a "verse" from the Blble:

FROM HIS BONDSMAN.

CLAY CENTER, KAN., July 25, 1894.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I see in your last issue that you were apprehensiv about bail being furnished Mr. J. B. Wise. It is with great pleasure that I announce to you that I had the satisfaction of giving his one hand a hearty shaking on the eve of the 21st. Mr. Wise is looking very well after his four weeks' penance in Leavenworth jail. All Liberals around here seem to unite in thinking that he ought to be well defended; and as it requires some one to set the ball rolling, I am going to write to prominent Liberals in surrounding country to, in church parlance, pass around the hat; and I hav reason to believe we shall be pretty successful. If, as you stated, the Defense Association takes up his case, we will forward funds to them; otherwise we must do the best we can here. GEORGE HARRISON.

FROM THE BIBLE DISTRIBUTOR HIMSELF.

CLAY CENTER, KAN., July 16, 1894.

DEAR FRIEND MACDONALD: I see that you hav heard of my trouble and imprisonment in the Leavenworth jail. The Rev. H. B. Vennum of Industry had me confined for simply quoting the twelfth verse of the thirty-sixth chapter of Isaiah verbatim on a postal card, for information, and sending it through the mails to him. And for that, and that only, he had me arrested by United States Marshal Lardner, who took me to Leavenworth and stuck me in jail without a hearing or anything else. I was confined just four weeks last Saturday noon, July 14th, at which time I was released on bond of $300 furnished by my Liberal friend, George Harrison, of Clay Center, Kan. My bond was given almost two weeks before I left jail, but I could not get anyone to release me. United States Marshal Neely of Leavenworth was the proper one to do that, but for the last four weeks he was away from home most of the time looking after the strikers, and for that reason I was not released. Therefore I spent just four weeks in jail, coming home last Saturday evening, July 14th.

The court will convene October 8, 1894, at which time I will hav to make my appearance. I do hope the Freethinkers throughout the country will assist me a little financially as well as otherwise in securing a good lawyer to defeat the orthodox Christians, as my acquittal would be a great and glorious victory for Freethought. In conclusion I will say I am a thousand times obliged to you for inserting the letters in regard to my case in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also commenting on them. I intend to go around in the meantime among my Liberal friends in this community and see whether they will assist me to secure a lawyer. What I want is an able lawyer, and one that will not charge too much. As you are aware, I am a very poor man financially, and hav to depend on my friends almost entirely if I secure a lawyer at all. If not, I will hav to depend on the state to provide me with counsel. I hope all the Freethought papers throughout the United States will hav something to say about my case and shame the Christians so that they will go to work and investigate the Bible thoroughly and see for themselvs what that Bible really is. J. B. WISE.

It is an outrage that any man should be compelled to remain for weeks in jail after his bonds hav been signed. Such disregard of citizen's rights is the most inflammable, terrible fuel for the fires of discontent and sedition.

We join with the National Defense Association in calling for funds for the defense of Mr. Wise. Let all who are interested in the maintenance of the freedom of the press and mails; all who believe that Christians hav no right to punish Freethinkers for doing what they themselvs do by the million copies in transmitting their "sacred" book through the mails, and all who would gladly assist a worthy man who has been assaulted because he was thought to be unable to defend himself, send what they can to aid in defraying the expenses which must be incurred in the coming trial or trials of Mr. Wise. Remit to this office. It is a splendid opportunity to show up the Bible, for Mr. Wise must either be acquitted or the Bible must stand condemned by a United States court as too obscene a book to be quoted from.

Every member of the Harrisburg base-ball club was fined four dollars and costs for playing on Sunday, June 30th. And every preacher drew his per diem for his regular Sunday work. Who is unsophisticated enough to say that we hav one law for the priest and the unsurpliced citizen?

Maryland appears to badly need a new constitution and a Judge Parker to interpret the common law for her present stupid officials. Rev. A. J. Howard, of the Seventh-Day Adventists, and Henry Bullen, a member of his congregation, hav been arrested in Ann Arundel county for "Sabbath breaking." It is probable that they deserve hanging, at the least, for they were so horribly wicked as to work in their gardens on the first day of the week. If God does not know any better than to let weeds grow on his day, what business has any mere "worm of the dust" to hoe the weeds out on that day? If he (God) wants weeds and imbecils, why should not his unreasonable whim be gratified? He has both in Maryland, as elsewhere, and several of the imbecils, as is usual, hav got into office.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps (with the exception of the New York section) will this week write to the American Book Company of New York in protest against the incorporation of articles in advocacy of religious "Sabbaths" and Sabbath laws in our school books. We see by the latest issues of the Covenanter papers, whose church is behind the theoloical text-book scheme, that the theocrats are bringing every possible influence to bear to induce school-book publishers to prepare and print the works they want put into the common schools. They are flooding the American Book Company, Ginn & Company, of Boston, Potter & Company, of Philadelphia, and other houses of the kind with letters begging that their, the theocrats', religious dogmas be put into the manuals of instruction to be used in the schools of the people. The effrontery of this is appalling, and is explainable only on the supposition, which is reasonable, that these men think that Sabbath laws are the "last ditch" of their cause. Not long since a prominent representativ of one of the churches said that the Sabbath was "the last outward and visible sign of Christianity." This is not strictly true, for church property is yet exempt from taxation and many other privileges are given to the churches. Of course it is understood that these church-state advocates hav no conception of a vital Christianity or of a living Sabbath. They can comprehend and love only the Gatling-guaranteed letter of the law. So it is approximately true that the state-supported Sabbath is "the last outward and visible sign of Christianity," so far as Protestants are concerned. Catholics, in some countries, are not quite so poverty stricken. They hav yet "the sacrament of marriage," and they feel as bad about losing it as their Covenanter brethren do when threatened with the loss of Sunday laws. In proof of this, witness the hue and cry against the Hungarian civil marriage bill.

The Constitutional Convention's Committee on Taxation has reported adversely on all propositions for equality of taxation. However, it may yet be possible to get a minority report from one or more members of that and associated committees. If so, the matter can still be brought before the Convention. To this end it will be in order for the New York members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps to continue their missionary work with the members of these committees. Urge the necessity of getting a guarantee of justice in taxation into the fundamental law of the state. It is given out that it is not deemed expedient for the Convention to meddle with the details of taxation, which should be left to the legislature. This seems to us absurd, in so far as it is implied that the broad general question of equity in state burden-bearing involves the "details of taxation." It does nothing of the kind. We may hav to appeal to the legislature ultimately, but so long as the Convention is in session it is that body which must receive our attention. Here are the names of committeemen:

Mr. Milo M. Acker, of Hornellsville; Commodore P. Vedder, Ellicottville; I. S. Johnson, Warsaw; Owen Cassidy, Havana; A. B. Steele, Herkimer; S. B. Jacobs, Brooklyn; O. A. Fuller, Wellsville; F. B. F. Tibbetts, Ithaca; C. R. Pratt, Elmira; A. L. Kellogg, Oneonta; William P. Goodelle, Syracuse; John A. Barhite, Rochester; D. Gerry Wellington, Hamilton; B. S. Dean, Jamestown; Charles H. Moore, Plattsburg; W. J. Montayne, Cortland; M. L. Parker, Lyndonville; J. M. Maybee, Livingston M.; W. J. Roche, John H. Peck, Troy; Peter A. Rogers, West Troy; E. A. Brown, Dolgeville; W. M. Mullen, Stapleton; Wm. Kimmey, D. P. Kerwin, John T. McDonough, Albany; F. W. Holls, Yonkers; E. R. Brown, Watertown; H. R. Durfee, Palmyra; M. H. Hirschberg, Newburg; J. E. McIntyre, Potsdam; H. W. Hill, Buffalo; Frederick Fraser, Salen; G. R. Cornwell, Penn Yan; J. W. Riggs, H. A. Powell, Mirabeau L. Towns, Brooklyn; A. H. Peabody, New Lebanon; C. L. Phipps, East Rockaway; C. W. H. Arnold, Staatsburg; C. B. McLaughlin, Port Henry; L. M. Mauley, Long Island City; G. L. Danforth, Middleburg; F. T. Fitzgerald, W. McM. Speer, Nelson Smith, W. P. Burr, M. J. Mulqueen, J. W. McLaughlin, S. S. Blake, E. Lauterbach, L. A. Giegerich, Elliot Sandford, C. S. Truax, Robert E. Deyo, H. W. Platzek, Francis Forbes, Eugene Durnin, Thomas Gilleran, A. C. Hottenrorth, New York.

What some of the editors of papers in this state think of the proposition to tax church property can be ascertained by perusing pages 470 and 471. But the editor of the Geneva Gazette takes a different view of the question. Among other things, he says:

"A church edifice at Bellona, recently dedicated, costing $30,000 and upwards, was the memorial gift of a single woman, a non-resident. Taxes would fall upon a small congregation unable to bear them. St. Peter's church, Geneva, is of similar origin, although its cost of $50,000 was borne in large part by many non-residents as a testimony of reverential respect for the memory of Bishop De Lancey, the first bishop of Western New York; it is a free church—any and all who seek admission to its services are heartily welcomed. Is it fair to impose taxes upon this property which its comparativly few and for the most part poor communicants would be obliged to bear? The fact is, this proposition to tax property has its inspiration in sources of Infidelity, and should be vigorously opposed by the moral and religious sentiment of the state, which we firmly believe is the preponderating element."

The foregoing are fair samples of the fallacies indulged in by the pro-exemptionists. If the Bellona society has received a gift so valuable that it cannot pay the taxes upon it, it is certainly in an undesirable position, but we fail to see that other people should be compelled to help it out of the difficulty. Where would be the justice of such a transfer of burdens? Tax all church property, and benefactors would put less money into pretentious buildings, reserving parts of their gifts for the payment of taxes and other legitimate expenses. What would be thought of an individual who had received as a present a magnificent residence and who should appeal to the assessor or equalization board to exempt his gift from taxation on the ground that he was too poor to pay the taxes on it! Even if it is a heavy burden for him to bear, would it be just to remit the tax on his property and put it on the property of his equally poor neighbors? Suppose that the Geneva church is free, what of it? Why should people who do not care to attend its services be forced to provide religious "consolation" gratis to those who do? The Gazette's entire argument is trivial, misleading, and is, in effect, a plea for religious pauperism. It is within the limits of possibility that its editor would write differently if he did not believe that "the moral and religious sentiment of the state" is "the preponderating element" and that this element is opposed to church taxation. It would almost seem that he is writing in an ironical vein, so difficult is it to believe that any man with sufficient intelligence to edit any kind of a paper can be fooled by such humbug "arguments."

THE Freethinkers of Kansas will hold a convention in Lawrence, Kan., September 6th–9th. Preparations are being made to hav it a grand success. Excellent speaking and singing will be the distinctiv features of the occasion. Many Freethinkers—Agnostics, Spiritualists, and Liberals of other shades—hav signified their intention of being present and participating in the deliberations of the convention. Kansas is having good crops this year and, notwithstanding the calamity of the great strike, its people are hopeful and look forward to better times in the not distant future. W. S. Bell is now lecturing in Kansas, helping to prepare the minds of the Liberals for the coming intellectual feast. His address is 114 East Fourth street, Topeka, Kan.

NEW YORK EDITORS.

They Discuss the Problem of Equal and Impartial Taxation,

Basing Their Remarks on The Truth Seeker's "Church Property" Pamphlet.

WHICH HELPS TO SPREAD THE LIGHT.

The Subject is Very Ably Handled.
Lansingburg Times.

We hav received from the Truth Seeker Co., 28 Lafayette place, New York, a book entitled, "Church Property: Should it be Exempt from Taxation?" The subject is very ably handled, and very strong arguments given why church property should be taxed. This book, after telling what exemption has done in Italy, beggaring the people, says of Montreal: "The city is feeling more the burden of taxation. The largest owners of real estate are Protestants. Their taxes increase in the ratio of Roman Catholic institutions. Property which paid taxes is being sold to religious orders, and thus becomes exempt from taxes, and the burden of the city expenditure falls upon the few." In New York city alone the value of church property is $54,670,600, divided as follows: Episcopal, $16,393,000; Presbyterian, $9,354,000; Catholics, $8,124,750; Baptists, $3,878,800; Jewish, $3,740,000; Methodist, $3,971,750; Reformed, $3 448,000; Congregationalists, $1,015,500; Unitarian, $630,000; Universalist, $565,000; Friends, $448,000; Disciples of Christ, $113,000; miscellaneous, $1,367,000. In Troy church property is valued at: Episcopalian, $377,500; Catholic, $504,200; Presbyterian, $441,500; Methodist, $300,500; Baptist, $160,000; miscellaneous, $211,500; total, $1,995,200. In revising the Constitution, this would be a good subject to look after.

Church Property Should be Taxed.
Gowanda Herald.

That church property should not be exempt from taxation is an idea which is fast becoming a settled fact in the minds of a majority of thoughtful, practical people, and professed real Christians at that. The Truth Seeker Co., of 28 Lafayette place, New York, has issued a pamphlet containing so many cogent, powerful, and common sense reasons why church property should be taxed, that we do not see how any one can carefully read it and fail to become convinced of the strength of its arguments. It is an argument for equality of taxation, and a statement of facts, giving, from the census of 1890, the value, by denominations, of church property in the United States, and in the several states and territories, and in all cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relativ standing as to wealth of the leading denomnations and denominational groups, with much other matter of especial interest to certain cities, states, and sections. All comparisons are based upon official figures. Let us take New York state as an example. In this state we find one-fifth of the total church property in the United States. The figures as given by the census are $140,123,008. The denominations which are the chief beneficiaries of this enormous tax-emption roll are these: Protestant Episcopal, $31,142,613; Catholic, $25,769,478; Presbyterian, $22,727,192; Methodist, $18,305,200; Baptist, $13,625,588; Reformed, $7,698,280; Congregationalist, $5,175,262; Lutheran, $4,693,375; Jewish Congregational, $4,315,200; Universalist, $1,798,250; Unitarian, $1,117,500; Friends, $767,450; Independent Congregations, $722,400; German Evangelical Synod, $681,570; Evangelical Association, $401,850; Disciples of Christ, $363,650; The Christians, $257,850; New Jerusalem, $192,900; Moravians, $127,200; Adventist, $58,700; Catholic Apostolic Church, $55,000; United Brethren, $34,650; Spiritualist, $33,250; Chinese Temples, $25,000.

Some Observations on Exemption in General.
Nunda News.

"The amount of property exempt from taxation in the county of Livingston is over one million and a quarter of dollars."—Ex.

There is too much property that is exempt from taxation by law, and there is too much that escapes taxation by being covered up and sworn off so that the farm lands and village property, which is in sight, has to pay more than its share of the taxes. It is all wrong, and is an evil that ought to be righted. How personal property escapes taxation has been demonstrated in Portage by the investigation of the railroad officials. One man who used to swear off an assessment of $600 on personal property it is now known ought to pay a tax of $17,000 on personal. It is so everywhere, and from $75,000 to $100,000 of personal in every town escapes taxation, because assessors are not thorough enough, as well as for other reasons. But a widow, with a house and lot and a few hundred, is obliged to pay taxes on every dollar she is worth.

Quotes Generously From "Church Property."
Goshen News.

The question of the exemption of church property from taxation, and why it should be exempt, is one which has led to grave discussion in years past, pro and con, and is again prominently brought before the public by the advocates of non-exemption. A monthly publication bearing the very captivating title of "The Truth Seeker Library," published at 28 Lafayette place, New York city, is before us, earnestly dealing with this subject and advocating in strong and unmistakable language the taxation of church property by the same right and on the same footing as banks and other public institutions. While not deeming it advisable to offer any opinion of our own on this question at present, in the status of the question which the agitation has now reached, we giv, in lieu thereof, some of the more salient points made by "The Truth Seeker Library" in maintaining the right and justice of why taxation of church property should be imposed, and at the same time adduce some of the reasons of the advocates of exemption from such taxation of the property of all ecclesiastical denominations and organizations, without any exception whatever.

It seems in no spirit of hostility to religious beliefs or creeds that this question is now brought before the public on the lines we hav above intimated, as advocated by the writer, as he bases his argument and conclusions on the broad correlativ principle that whereas church corporations and societies claim there should be "no taxation without representation," on the other hand there should be "no representation without taxation." The conclusion naturally follows that so long as any kind of private property is subject to taxation, should not all kinds be equally subject? Each person invests his money where he believes it will yield him the largest dividend pecuniarily, or in mental or moral satisfaction. Because one man puts $1,000 into a church and another the same amount into a Masonic hall is no reason why the latter should be required to pay the taxes on both sums. It would be plainly an injustice to compel him so to do. Again, could anything be more inequitable than the exemption from taxation of a million-dollar cathedral, built and patronized by wealthy people, while the small stores and shops of the men and women who can barely make a living are taxed to the extreme limit of the rate?

As against this argument for taxation of church property it is offered as an off-set that church property is non-productiv and does not bear the same relation to civil and governmental obligations that require the levying of taxes on the subjects of a government for its maintenance and support. This is the main argument, besides the religious and charitable feature of the churches, which the advocates of exemption of churches and church property from taxation build their house of sand upon. But is there not also a vast amount of other property which is unproductiv, and shall it too be exempt from taxation? Many business investments turn out disastrously. Thousands of failures are recorded every year. Men put into various enterprises much more than they are able to get out of them. Should this unproductiv secular property be given a "free pass" by the state from all assessment of taxation? Why should non-productiv ecclesiastical property be exempt, while non-productiv secular property is taxed?

The homes of the people, from the laborer's cottage to the millionaire's mansion, are non-productiv. From the hour they are completed, until they are destroyed by fire or flood or tempest, or become uninhabitable through the slow but sure process of decay, they are constantly subject to deterioration, continually requiring repairs, alterations, and additions, which necessitate the expenditure of money that returns neither interest, profit, nor wages to him who spends it. Are these non-productiv houses, with their plots of ground, exempt from taxation? Many of the halls and rooms owned by secret and fraternal societies are non-productiv, and hence should be exempt from taxation if non-productivity is a legitimate cause for the exemption of churches.

But, as a matter of fact, all churches are not wholly unproductiv. In many of them pews are rented at large prices, which put them out of the reach of all but the more wealthy people of the society, making these churches practically Sunday club-rooms for the rich. Why should they not pay taxes on these luxuriant appointments of worship? In many ways the churches are productiv, and are money-making institutions. They are collectiv offices and workshops, and in them are gathered most of the moneys which pay the salaries of one hundred and twelve thousand or more clergymen, and in them these clergymen do much of the work which entitles them to pay. Here, also, are collected the vast sums which maintain great missionary boards, thus furnishing remunerativ employment to thousands more men and women. In the buildings owned by these religious corporations millions of dollars are annually raised by means of pew rentals, fairs, raffles, meals, collections, and subscriptions. How, then, we ask, can they be exempted from taxation on the ground of non-productivity?

Who will argue that property which one individual has received by gift from another should not be taxed? Certainly such a claim would be preposterous. Why, then, make it in the interest of a church? A church is nothing but a society of individuals. This society may or may not make a better use of the gifts it receives than does the individual of the gifts bestowed upon him. But whether it does or does not has nothing to do with the question of equal taxation, on churches as well as any and all other private institutions. It is claimed that the churches exercise a great moral influence, and therefore they should not be taxed, is another of the common objections urged by those who hav not thoughtfully examined this problem. Perhaps no other "argument" against justice in taxation has so much influence on the average man as this, and yet no defense of church pauperism could be weaker. Advocates of exemption should bear in mind that no one wishes to tax the "moral influence" of the churches; it is their property which it is affirmed should bear its proportion of the public burdens. The argument for the taxation of church property has been fairly stated, and challenges more forceful reasoning for its repeal by the advocates of its exemption.

Some Arguments from a Correspondent.
Le Roy Gazette.

EDITOR THE GAZETTE: The question of taxing church property seems to be a question of lively debate before the State Constitutional Convention. The public hav generally conceded it right and courteous to exempt church property from taxation. But, undoubtedly, very few hav given the subject due consideration. If the church was a public institution existing for the whole public, why, it would be just to exempt it from taxation. As it is, the amount of taxes which would be received from church property if not exempt from taxation, has to be raised from other taxpayers. Thus it can be readily seen, uninterested parties are obliged indirectly to support church societies, which are mainly private organizations, and should support themselvs. H.

"Church Property: Should it be Exempt from Taxation? Reasons Why it Should Not," is the title of an anonymous pamphlet published by the Truth Seeker Co. of New York. It bristles with statistics showing the value of church property in the various states.

Arguments Are Wholesome.

It Is Worth Perusal.

Number 40 of the Truth Seeker Library deals with the oft-discussed subject of taxation of church property, and givs over one hundred pages in support of the argument that churches hav no more right in equity to be exempt from taxation than the homes of the workingmen. It is full of statistics and other data, and is worth perusal, whether you agree with the ideas advanced or not. Price, 15 cents. Truth Seeker Co., 28 Lafayette place, N. Y.

A Western View.

Chicago Record (the most religious daily of Chicago).

The question of taxing church property is again the subject of discussion. The present movement seems to be carried on and encouraged by some Protestant churches. It is alleged, with how much accuracy cannot be said, that four-fifths of the Protestants in this country are in favor of church property bearing its just proportion of the burdens of supporting the government, and it is true that very many declare that the church ought not to be a pensioner on the state.

Every state and territory in the Union givs churches some exemption, most of them without any regard to values, while some tax those worth more than a specified sum. About one-third of the states exempt parsonages belonging to churches as well. Church edifices and land alone, exclusiv of parsonages, colleges and the like, are valued at $679,694,439, and it is probable that this would need to be at least doubled to include all other church property. It is safe to put the value of church property in the United States at $1,361,374,000. It is a question which seriously disturbs ministers and laymen alike whether an element of society that is so rich ought to ask any exemption from the burdens that fall alike on rich and poor, especially when the churches receive all the benefits of government that the humblest citizen can claim.

It may be said that one of the worst obstacles the church has frequently had to contend with is the favoritism which it has received from the state. A poor man, likely to lose his home for non-payment of taxes, is justly aggrieved that the costly church near him shares no part of the burden which the state imposes on him, and the wars and disturbances that hav been caused by large accumulations of church wealth in other countries show how intense this feeling may be. Confiscation of this property by the state has been sometimes the only way of restoring peace.

The feeling is becoming very general inside of the church itself that, as a matter of business, it would be better for the church to pay taxes on its property than to permit it to remain exempt, and that it is unwise to permit an institution of such high character to be to any extent a public pauper or pensioner and not assume duties and responsibilities which it regards as essential in a good, honest citizen. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" is a command that many believe is evaded when exemption from taxation is asked or received.

Many of the strongest defenders of the church in this country heartily favor the taxation of church property. The one exemption that could be reasonably asked is for hospitals that are supported by charity for alleviating human misery and suffering without compensation. Public charities are not sectarian organizations, and although they may be supported by a sect they are for all sufferers regardless of religious belief.

It may be, as is urged, that taxation of church property would put a check upon much extravagance in building fine church edifices and would prove to be a barrier against church debts, which are often a greater burden than any amount of taxation that could legally be assessed against church holdings.

Perhaps if God's voice had not "walked in the garden, in the cool of the day," we might never hav been compelled to "sweat" while we dug up Canada thistles to save a $100 fine.

One of the things our heavenly father hates (Prov. vi, 17) are "hands that shed innocent blood." Therefore it is wrong for us to wonder if it is because of jealously for fear some one may beat his own passover record down in Egypt.

Presbyterians will soon be considering the question of whether or not the late frost in the bad place was not caused by the melting of that side of the great "fixed" gulf (now known to be ice) which has been exposed to so much heat that the lower levels hav filled with water and submerged their pet hobby.

Some enterprising Yankee who may possibly hav worked his way into heaven will no doubt undertake to locate and hold the riparian ownership of the stream which is reputed to issue from under the great white throne. If it is never needed there for irrigation purposes he could, no doubt, pipe it down and obtain an excellent pressure in the regions below, where is said to be a large permanent population in a climate of perpetual drouth and unprotected as yet from imminent danger of fire.

Mr. Hays and the Tariff.

"'Tis with our judgment as our watches; none
Go just alike, yet each believes his own."

If there were no axes to grind it seems to me that this everlasting wrangle about the tariff would soon cease. But those who work for self-interest and those who work for the common weal can never agree.

It is remarkable that at this late day, as shrewd a people as the Americans claim to be should still be disputing about the tariff. It ought to hav been settled in twenty years after it was taken in hand by keen Yankee intellect; and yet, after a hundred years of discussion, it is no nearer a settlement than when just taken up. And a hundred years hence the first question asked a man who shall arriv at the gate of St. Peter will be, "How do you stand on the tariff?" As I understand the tariff question, it is a tax levied upon foreign commodities for the privilege of being sold in our market, no matter whether the importer be nativ or foreign born. This tax, whatever it may be, is added to the price of the goods, and must ultimately be paid by the consumer.

There is a point of land in Spain, running out into the Strait of Gibraltar, called Tariffa. Formerly all vessels passing that point were laid under tribute; not because there was any justice in the claim, but because there was power to enforce it. The tariff had its origin in this circumstance, and it is just as dishonest to-day as it was then.

Because it makes the poor pay what the rich ought to pay. In other words, it taxes people according to what they are compelled to consume and not according to their ability to pay. This tax is supposed to be levied for a twofold purpose; to afford a revenue to defray the expenses of the government and to protect American industries. In the first place, there is but one honest way to defray the expenses of the government, and that is by laying a tax directly upon the people according to their ability to pay.

The poor ought not to be taxed at all. It is safe to say that one-half of the people hav no income above a bare living, and to tax such people is an outrage. The wealthy half of the people, who ought to pay all the expenses of the government, through this nefarious scheme shift a great proportion of the burden upon the shoulders of the poor, who ought not to be taxed at all. In case of a disturbance they are called upon to defend the property of the rich and are compelled to face the storm of war, and that is as much as ought to be required of them.

As for protecting our industries, it ought to be seen and understood that it is impossible to favor a man engaged in an industry unless it is at the expense of somebody else. A tariff produces nothing, and consequently there can be nothing to distribute as a general benefit to all. What one receives must be at the expense of somebody else.

We had in this vicinity three bachelors worth, in the aggregate, say, a hundred and twenty thousand dollars. There were at the same time a half dozen men with large families, each of which would consume more than the three rich bachelors, and consequently would pay more to support the government than the three rich men. A greater injustice could not be imagined.

The poor men hav nothing to be protected, but their sons may be called upon to protect the property of the rich men. Thus the poor in many instances are made to contribute more than the rich, and may be called upon to protect the property of the rich, while the rich are rarely called upon to sacrifice anything to the poor. This is the practical working of a tariff for revenue.

Take the tariff schedule and visit the apartment of the widow around the corner, who supports her, self by washing, and see how many articles there are in her scantily furnished room which do not bear the earmark of the tariff tax. Is this the best this great Yankee nation can do? Must it tax the poor widow at the wash-tub?

A half dozen men meet in the city of New York and agree to send the price of coal up a dollar on the ton. The widow around the corner is compelled to pay the advanced price. Some men from Nova Scotia tell her that they will furnish coal to her at a cheaper rate. But the government steps in and tells her that if she buys coal of the Nova Scotia men she must pay a tax which will bring the price up to that asked by the Pennsylvania men.

Two or three of the men who sent the price of coal up, own a hole in the ground in Pennsylvania. According to the laws of nature, they would be puzzled to show that they hav any better right to the hole, to the exclusion of others, than they hav to the sunshine. They hav a thousand men engaged in bringing coal out of the hole. These men are oppressed until they rebel, and there is great disturbance in the neighborhood of the hole. Troops are sent to shoot them down because they refuse to work for starvation wages. And then the widow is taxed to pay the troops. Will the men who own the hole ever be taxed to defend the widow? Her sons may be forced to protect the property of the men who put up the price of coal on their mother? Will Mr. Hays please explain how a tariff on coal makes it come cheaper to the widow?

Mr. Hayes says, "Under a protectiv tariff there is no free trade in labor." Will he please show when an embargo has been laid on foreign labor? While the cry has been constantly kept up against the importation of foreign manufactures to compete with American products—that if untaxed it would destroy our industries—the manufacturers themselvs hav been allowed to swarm to our shores, without let or hindrance, to underbid and displace our laborers, and to fill all the avenues to industrial pursuits.

"The benefits of the tariff are about equally divided between the employee and the consumer. The former gets more money for his labor, and the latter more goods for his money."

The protectionists hav been ringing the changes on this self-contradiction until it has become stale. One man writes an article to show that a tariff givs the grower a better price for his wool, and it is made to look quite plausible. Another writes an article to prove that the manufacturer gets a broader margin on his profits, and therefore can pay better wages to the operativs who reduce the wool to cloth, and then that competition between manufacturers will force prices down so that the cloth will come cheaper to those who wear it. Thousands hav been befogged with this kind of tariff philosophy, without being able to see the hole in the skimmer. These statements taken separately as they are generally presented to the reader, do not appear to be so very ridiculous. But when taken together and compared, one with the other, the absurdity involved is too great for serious consideration.

Now I will not analyze these statements, but will dispose of the whole in a batch by asking Mr. Hays to take a single fleece of wool and so manipulate it as to giv the wool grower a better price for his product, and the manufacturer a broader margin on his profits, and the operativs who reduce the wool to cloth better wages, and then make the cloth come cheaper to those who wear it.

If Mr. Hays is successful in harmonizing these palpable contradictions, I would to like hav him tell how the three boys who were shut up in the barn made seventy-five cents a-piece trading jack-knives, and each one got his old knife back again. And then he will be able to draw his suspenders tight enough to raise himself off the ground.

Again: "Europe can sell more cheaply than we." Then, according to this tariff philosophy, we must lay a tariff on the products of this cheap foreign labor which will bring it up to a level with American labor. In India a man works for a pound of salt a day. What kind of a tariff would Mr. Hays lay on articles manufactured in India to bring the price of labor up to what it is here?—for, according to Mr. Hays, it must be done or we cannot cope with Indian manufacturers.

With a machine propelled by steam a man will plow, cultivate, and sow a strip twelve feet wide, and move at the rate of three miles an hour. In India everything is done by hand. In a Western mine a powerful engin, with two men to 'tend it, throws out hundreds of barrels of water per minute. In Egypt, where labor is about as cheap as it is in India, they raise water with a human treadwheel. Does Mr. Hays think we could not compete with these people? Brains will always hav the advantage over muscle in the production of cheap commodities. England would prove the sharpest competitor that we should hav to contend with—not because she has the cheapest labor, but for the opposit reason, that next to America she pays the highest wages of any nation in the world, and her laborers, therefore, are the hardest to compete with because the most intelligent. American laborers are the best paid of any in the world, and therefore are the most independent, the most enterprising, and the most intelligent of any nation. They read more, think more, invent more, than any other people. The inventiv genius of this country turns out more labor-saving machinery and more useful inventions than all the European nations combined; and for this reason, with fair play and an open field, we can cope with any nation on earth.

"Under free trade," continues Mr. Hays, "European producers will lower prices until American competition is destroyed; after that they will charge what they please, and America is bound to pay." The time has gone by for men to be deceived with that old, worm-eaten chestnut. American competition will never be destroyed until the independence, enterprise, intelligence, and inventiv genius of the American people are wiped out. We can enter the markets of the world to-day with any European nation and distance them in the production of cheap commodities. The higher wages are here, and the lower wages are in other countries, the easier we can compete with them. The civilization of any country may be inferred from the condition of the working people. One man in this country will produce more than a hundred men in some countries. To say that other nations will charge what they please, and that we shall be bound to pay, is little better than schoolboy talk. How can other nations compel us to pay what they are pleased to ask, any more than we can force our commodities upon them at what we are pleased to ask? Half the people hav been made to believe that without a tariff other nations could flood us with their productions, and that we would be compelled to buy without regard to our wants or their prices. I cannot see how they can compel us to buy what we do not want; and if they bring what we do want, is it not our privilege to buy?

Naples, N. Y.

News and Notes.

I reach Chicago in the midst of the throb and excitement of the great labor strike. To the most careless observer it was evident that a tremendous and far-reaching movement was going on whose end would not be seen perhaps in this generation. It was not merely an ebullition. It takes on somewhat the proportions of a revolution. No such problem ever confronted the world as the industrial problem of to-day. Unless it is rightly settled the upheaval of our civilization is certain. There are incalculable forces at work. One thing surely must be eliminated before there is any successful solution, and that is the superstition of the past; and the strike has impressed upon me the necessity of Freethought as the first condition of reform.

Superstition, however, still parades the streets. The Salvation Army was out in all its glory and tatters a few nights since. There was to be a marriage, and a great deal of style was put on. It was a good chance for a financial gain. A procession of women clothed in white, with bells in their hands, marched along the principal streets of the West side. This was followed by the usual motley crowd of the Salvation Army. The band played at the front of the column, which finally reached the Princess Opera House, the headquarters of the army. The admission to the marriage scene was ten cents and twenty-five cents. I did not avail myself of the privilege, but quite a number did, and no doubt Cupid raked in the shekels for the Lord. As a business affair I guess it was a success.

Dr. and Mrs. de Lespinasse are in the city, and E. A. Stevens and wife, and so the few days I spent in Chicago were filled with social entertainment. At the home of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. L. Robertson, as elsewhere, there were pleasant gatherings.

On Friday, July 13th, Mr. Reichwald took me over to St. Jo, the great fruit section of Michigan, where land was once worth five hundred dollars an acre, but the uncertainties of the peach crop, etc., hav reduced the value at least one-half. It almost always happens that when man has a good thing in the way of fruit or grain, "God" is pretty sure to come in with the grasshopper, or locust, or scale, or "yellows," and prevent the harvest. Thousands of peach-trees hav been destroyed about St. Jo. When the "yellows" put in an appearance not only the fruit, but root and branch and everything hav to be burned up, or the disease is sure to spread. "Mysterious" indeed are the ways of "Providence."

It is a fine trip over to St. Jo from Chicago. Lake Michigan spreads before us like a great ocean. The city with its thousand palaces sinks from view. No land is in sight. On every side is a blue expanse of water and sky. We leave Chicago at 9 30. About 1 o'clock the sandy bluffs of Michigan appear and the towers and roofs of St. Jo, which is a pretty place of about seven thousand inhabitants. At St. Jo we take the electric car for Benton Harbor, three miles away. This is more of a business place than St. Jo, and has a population of ten thousand. We drive out to the Eastman Springs, somewhat famous in this country. There are seventeen springs and every one of a different quality. They are said to be quite conduciv to good health. One is called the "Rejuvenator." If you drink of this three times a day you are guaranteed to liv to a hundred years of age. I think I shall retire to this comfortable and somewhat romantic spot when I hav finished the Freethought work. It is much better than the orthodox heaven. It is a delightful little wooded ravine where the soft breezes and the gentle waters make music, the very place for poetic reverie and philosophic contentment. At Benton Harbor, after returning from the Springs, we spend the evening with Mr. Winslow and Dr. Ryno, both Liberals, and I presume there are others in the place; but they do not materialize sufficiently for Freethought work. However, those we did meet were stanch to the backbone, subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, and ready to entertain the Secular Pilgrim. At 10 o'clock the same evening we take the boat for Chicago, and the next morning are in the big and bustling city.

Sunday afternoon, at Robertson's, under the auspices of Dr. de Lespinasse and Stevens, we had some "table tippings." Mrs. de Lespinasse seems to hav a wonderful amount of electricity, or "spiritual power," or whatever you may call it, for the table was quite lively in its performances and generally intelligent in its answers to our queries. The "spirits" seemed to be about the most sensible I hav come across, for they did not require any reverent frame of mind in the interlocutors, or any faith. We were all Materialists, but the unseen power was just as voluble as if we had been believers. I hav no explanation as yet of these curious phenomena—I suspend judgment—but I hav no doubt, if the "spirits" consent to manifest themselvs in broad daylight and submit to rigid scientific investigation, that we shall be able to locate them somewhere in the natural processes of the universe.

Sunday evening I leave for Red Jacket, Mich. I had to giv up for the time being my lectures at Shell Rock, Ia., and vicinity. I shall make arrangements for that part of the lecture field later on; but having a call to Red Jacket, I felt it best to try this hitherto unexplored country. It is eighteen hours' ride from Chicago, and is one of the northernmost points of Michigan. Here are the famous Calumet and Hecla copper mines. There are about seventeen thousand people in this township, including Calumet and Red Jacket, which are practically one town. The pay-roll amounts to $250,000 per month. The mines are vast in extent and run down to the depth of 5,200 feet. An army of men are at work every day in the bowels of the earth. Enormous engins, 4,700 horse power and more, are kept constantly at work. The biggest engin is called Jumbo. It is a mighty and magnificent affair, and man, its creator, looks rather puny by its side. The chimneys loom up two hundred and fifty feet. The buildings are massiv. Indeed, these vast machineries are quite a manifestation of the imperial genius of man.

The men here are well taken care of, and are comfortable and happy. The employers seem to be animated by a just and generous spirit, and under such conditions a strike is impossible. The workmen receive, on an average, $2 a day, sometimes more and sometimes less, as they labor by contract. Houses are furnished by the company at the rate of $1 a room per month. A man with a family needs four rooms, which makes his rent $4 per month. Pullman charges $3 per month a room, which makes the rent at least $12 per month—quite a difference. The company repairs the houses here without extra pay, and furnishes wood and coal at cost. This shows something of what might be when justice prevails; when the workingman is not crushed, but is elevated and ennobled, and has a chance for leisure and improvement.

Red Jacket, however, is pretty well under the shadow of orthodoxy. There is a church at almost every corner; and almost every sect in Christendom appears. There is every nationality—a variety of people as well as of religions The Salvation Army flourishes, while the Romish Church is predominant. The Methodist comes next.

The opera house, which is owned and controled by the city, and is used for all sorts of entertainments, theatrical and otherwise, was secured for the lectures; but when the mayor found out that it was an "Infidel" lecture, he refused to let the opera house be open for any such purpose, and the doors were shut against us; and we were obliged to giv the lectures in Italian Hall. I doubt if this action of the mayor will add to his popularity, though he evidently did it for the purpose of making votes. There is some sense of justice in the minds of the people. The papers gav the officious proceedings a thorough condemnation, and advised the mayor to read Paine's "Common Sense," and find out the real purpose of Infidelity. The action of the mayor advertised extensivly the lectures, and the first evening the hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. The majority of the audience were Christians, induced by curiosity to come. They paid good attention. The subject of the lecture was the "Rights of Man and the Demands of Liberalism." About a couple of dozen of the Salvation Army left when it came to the question of the taxation of church property, etc. I had a much smaller audience on the second evening, most of the Christians staying away, but the audience I did hav was intelligent and appreciativ. The Liberals here are in a minority, but are not afraid to stand by their colors. No Freethought lectures hav been given here before, and I am breaking new ground. It is somewhat discouraging, but I think the result will be good. At any rate, there is agitation in the community, and new ideas. I had about five hundred present the first night, but only two women were there. This shows the drift of things and the prejudices to contend against. I giv three lectures in all at this place.

Mr. C. H. Chase is my mainstay here. He started the movement; bears most of the expenses and does most of the work. When he first came there were no subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, now there are four, I believe. Mr. Chase is not afraid to express himself. He is an enthusiastic Freethinker, and has been so for years. He livs with his mother, and I enjoy while here the hospitality of their home. I don't hav to fight the battles alone. I hav good comradeship.

Mr. James Kenney has also been very efficient in the work. He has been fighting the battles of Freethought in regard to the Sunday question, etc. He is on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER and keeps it in circulation where it will do the most good. Dr. G. W. Tape I met formerly in Portland, Or. He was at one time located at Willapa, Wash., and joined forces with our friend Jake Dressler on that Liberal frontier field; and these comrades can shake hands through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER "across the continent." Mr. William Smith and Octave Brousseau are also on THE TRUTH SEEKER list. Some good has been accomplished. A few hav dared to stand up and be counted. The ball has been set in motion, and although the present outlook is not very favorable, yet, with the future before us, we hav hopes of victory.

Red Jacket has scarcely felt the hard times. There is enough ore in sight to keep these vast mills running for half a century. They say that these mines were originally discovered by a hog rooting in the ground. He threw the ore in sight, and from this further discoveries were made. But the man who dug the first ore and made the first location is now poor. He could not realize the almost boundless wealth at hand. He had not the means. It afterward passed into the control of the present company—most of the claims being located by Professor Agassiz, whose son is now one of the chief promoters of the enterprise, and is said to be enormously wealthy. He has an eye, however, to the happiness and improvement of those whom he employs. Calumet township seems to hav a bright future before it, so far as material prosperity is concerned. Freethought, we hope, will come on later.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Pacific Greeting.

DEAR EDITOR: After two months of exile in mining regions I struck this hotel, where, on the public reading table, lay THE TRUTH SEEKER and Secular Thought. How my heart warmed at the greeting of these familiar friends! I fervently grasped the hand of the noble and courageous Freethinker Jensen, who thus dares to show his colors, and I resolved to ask you to tell your readers that one who has had a world-wide experience declares that he has never been in a more comfortable and better-managed house than the Hotel Dallas. Here, at the outer harbor of Victoria, lulled by the rippling of the Pacific waters, fanned by the cool, salt breezes, and inspired by the grand snow-crowned Olympic mountains that rise across the straits of Juan de Fuca, one can find all the rest and peace that nature's charms, added to human ingenuity, can bestow. Although nearly a mile from town, the electric cars run every ten minutes, and I advise any of your readers, who come to Victoria, to make their way at once to this hotel, which, in every sense, deserves the title Liberal.

Mr. W. Jensen, the proprietor of the Hotel Dallas, is an Englishman of Danish descent, who came to America in early life and, after engaging for eighteen months in the civil war, took Horace Greeley's advice, "Go West." For the last twenty years he has been engaged in hotel enterprises on the Pacific coast. He says that he received but little religious education and had not much to unlearn, but like all the practical men that one meets out West, in the effort to gain a living he learned the supremacy of natural law and the futility of all faith in miracle. Religion is ignored by the live man, and the only thing sensitiv to its influences that I hav heard of was a horse who dropped dead at the sound of a church bell.

It interested me to be accosted by the hotel porter, as I stood near the reading table, with the remark, "Here's a paper, sir, that I am very fond of, and that expresses my opinions." He handed me THE TRUTH SEEKER, and when I told him that I had sometimes had the honor to contribute to its columns, his respect was manifest. He asked me if I would like a copy of Franklin Steiner's tract, "Infidels and Charity," and went to get it; but, upon his return, he walked past me across the hall and came back with the tract placed in the center of a silver salver, which he presented with a profound bow. Was ever Infidel literature honored in such a way before? This well deserved it. I read it on the rocks this morning and found it an admirable reply to the common Christian sneer against the charitableness of unbelievers, and it is a good summary of facts also. I read THE TRUTH SEEKER too. Let me congratulate you on your grand work in spreading ideas among legislators, and compliment you and your worthy co-workers on the truly magnificent literature that fills your columns. I hav had no greater intellectual treat for a great while, or more rational enjoyment, than when reading your clear, logical, and forceful editorials; the bright, pungent, and level-headed "Observations" of George E.; the vigorous, terse saxon of that grandest of the writers for the people, John Peck, and the flowing, poetic, and yet "solid" sense of the genial Putnam, whose energetic efforts deserve the richest reward. Then Heston's pictures appeal to other senses and enforce the same glorious lesson of Universal Mental Liberty.

I hope I may find a gold mine out here labeled "Truth Seeker," and secure you the title to it, for gold could not be better employed than in doing your great work of emancipating the human mind.

Accept these few lines, prompted by impulse, with the best wishes of your comrade,

Victoria, B. C. ROBT. C. ADAMS.

Observations.

The New York Recorder has published an old letter of Colonel Ingersoll's, descriptiv of the qualities of some whisky which he therewith transmits, and the Christian temperance people will of course make the most of it. The letter is short; hence it does not contain a fraction of the commendation of strong drink to be found in the Bible, but that won't make an atom of difference with the Christian temperance people, because when anyone discusses the Bible brand of liquor with them they take refuge in what is known as the "two-wine theory"—that is, that the wine manufactured by Christ and recommended by the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles was simply the unfermented juice of the grape, while the sort that is condemned had worked and had a fuddle to it. Eminent Hebrew and Greek scholars, like Dr. Funk of the Voice and C. C. Moore of the Blue Grass Blade, differ about the "two-wine theory," but it is generally accepted; and after reading Colonel Ingersoll's letter I think the anti-Prohibitionists will agree with me that there are grounds for a two-whisky theory. Certainly the kind described is not like that we usually run up against. "In it," says the letter, "you will find the sunshine and the shadow that chased each other over the billowy fields." Not in the article sold in Albuquerque, N. M. On the contrary, the cowboy and the wild Indian chase each other through the sagebrush. "The breath of June," it goes on. That is not the breath which goes with Chicago goods. "The carol of the lark." The lark but not the carol, in San Francisco. "The dews of night, the wealth of summer and autumn, rich content, all golden and imprisoned light." How many of us anti-Prohibitionists ever struck that variety? "Drink it, and you will hear the voices of men and maidens singing 'Harvest Home.'" "Home till Mornin'," in New York. "Mingled with the laughter of children." In the Northwest they ask where you got that jag. "Drink it, and you will feel within your blood the star-led dawn, the dreamy, tawny dusks of many perfect days." Kansas City truck sends the blood to the nose; the dreams it causes are delirious, its mornings tawny only with remorse, and the day tapers slowly toward another night of it.

If there is such cornjuice as the letter describes, it must be as innocuous as the grape-milk of the gospels, and twice as satisfying. That there exists the kind which produces the phenomena I hav mentioned is beyond dispute. When the first variety occurs, we will all drink to the apostle Paul and to the guests at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee. With the fate of Noah in our minds we must touch the other more lightly, but let the gospel temperance people understand that we can hav a two-tanglefoot theory as well as they.

Mr. Robert Miller, in a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, remarks:

> Those, too, who hav been trying to convince us that all government is tyranny are having a little object lesson in their beautiful theory in the condition that confronts them in the present strike. On the whole, we who are not political economists are from the condition that confronts us inclined to believe that a little government influence rightly exerted would be a good thing just at present, at least, as what we see of the workings of the no government plan does not look very encouraging.

From what Mr. Miller says in other parts of his letter I judge that the foregoing was intended for my reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness, and I hereby tender my thanks for the interest shown. So as not to remain misunderstood, I must tell Mr. Miller that the theory of government held by myself has been violated by the strikers who undertook by force to control the railroad's property and by force to govern the railroad's employees. If they had stood by the principle of self government and non-interference in the exercise of private rights they would hav kept their hands off. It will be seen, then, that the trouble arose out of the governing idea, not from a lack of it. What is called the government—which is the state—intervened, not to govern anybody, but to defend persons and property. If this thought has escaped Mr. Miller's attention, I hope he will accept it in return for the suggestions he has made for my benefit.

The Koran of Mohammed, speaking with reference to the Jews, makes this statement:

> They said, We hav slain the messiah, Jesus the son of Mary, the prophet and apostle of God. Certainly they slew him not, neither crucified him; they crucified one among them that resembled him.

The view is one with which I hav not previously met up, but it is corroborated, apparently, by the gospels, which inform us that several days after the apostles thought they had seen Jesus crucified they found him enjoying a stroll in the suburbs of Jerusalem. Mohammed's statement may hav been based on a wild rumor, but a modern insurance company would hav investigated it before redeeming the policy of the deceased.

On one or two occasions I hav commented upon the public utterances and writings of a Philadelphia lady who entertained and propagated, with much soberness and sincerity, some most peculiar views on spirit marriage, phallism, the danse du ventre, and other virile questions. The lady alluded to held that sex worship was the true religion, which except a man believed faithfully he could not be saved. She also maintained that the abdominal wriggle of the Algerian women from the Midway Plaisance was a longer and shorter catechism for married people; and by the same token she wrote breezy essays on connubial reserve as taught by Oneida Noyes, giving as her source of knowledge her two or three years' of wedded life with a spook. As for worship of the noticeable discrepancies between voters and others, it is probably true that such has been in the past one of the manifestations of religious insanity. Large volumes hav been written on that subject without doing more than to show that the aspirations of the pious soul are not always upward. It is possibly true also that the danse du ventre contains some suggestion of the lunar month as related to the constitution of our afflicted sisters. A person may hold to these as facts, and at the same time enjoy good health; but when a spinster announces in print that she is no longer a maiden, having been joined in the holy bands of wedlock to a spirit husband, we know that the crazy ward of the lunatic asylum has a promising candidate. Mental rickets is a natural accompaniment and insanity the outcome; and such, I am now informed, is the fact in the present instance.

It may be out of order for anyone not an authority on mental and spiritual hocus pocus to state more than the crude facts in such cases, but everybody who has not swallowed his eyes can see that the way of the Philadelphia lady is the one traveled by people generally that get into relations with imaginary powers or persons whose feet do not touch this earth and who are present only to the fancy. Here we hav a woman giving a wife's attention to a husband in the moon and wasting nervous energy on a conjugal mate who has none to return. The uncompensating character of the process is apparent. It is a broken circuit; it is like stepping on a missing round of a ladder—kicking a dog that has gone around the corner—cutting at something with half a pair of shears. The system is bound to go broke.

Under the same head take praying to God. The prayer habit practiced to excess is insanity. You do all the talking; God does not reply. You make all the exertion; he does nothing. He is a great sponge, absorbing all that goes his way, and he is too far off to be squeezed. "Arrested for praying on the streets—held for examination as to his sanity" is the last the public hears of many religious enthusiasts. The wasted energy has drained them. I do not need to mention the forces exhausted in obtaining through spirit mediums the information that we liv after the death of the body and may return to communicate with friends still in the flesh. I allude to it merely to say that such information, which comprises all that any reputable person pretends to know about the future life, is of no more value than the fact that a man who goes West may come back, or that a bad penny will return. The spirits will accept all the attention we choose to pay to them—possibly because they cannot help themselvs—but a ghost, a guitar, and a good-night are all we hav so far to show for it. Does anybody think that other-worldliness really pays? The point I would make is that it does not.

A London Anarchist, named Mowbray, has come to town. It is understood that he believes in "propaganda by deed," and will endeavor to instill that doctrin into the American citizen. If Mr. Mowbray understands the present temper of his pupils he will not allow his mouth to escape from the judicious control of his intellects; for however beneficent may be the theory that successful political candidates should be disintegrated by bombs immediately upon taking office, and that capital should be dissipated by the same means, the mind of this generation is not sufficiently advanced to receive it with cordiality. There is a prevalent notion that no system of political economy which the propagandist may indorse can make the irresponsible taking of human like anything else than murder. The French gentlemen who distributed bombs with such impartiality in Paris perhaps thought otherwise. Messrs. Lega and Santo, the assailant of Crispi and the assassin of Carnot, seemed to be under the delusion that killing done in the name of society would come under some other caption than homicide. They were in error. Vaillant and Henry simply got their heads cut off; Santo will get it similarly in the neck, and Lega will go to jail for twenty years. It is quite immaterial whether or not their victims were enemies of "society," whatever that may be; it is certain that they were entitled to enjoy life and liberty on their own account, and their slayers deserved death in the same way that a man who knowingly puts his hand in the fire deserves to be burnt. If Mowbray goes into the bomb business or induces others to do so, I expect he will be hanged. He may talk until his wind givs out, but if he attempts propaganda by deed he and his followers are sure to be exterminated like rats. You see, there are so many people who object to murder that it becomes impracticable as a method.

According to the rule of fair play, under the provisions of which a man is expected to accord to others all the rights he claims for himself, these propagandists hav no grounds for redress, though hanged. The worst they can charge against the "ruling class" is murder, and they claim that right also for themselvs. Atrocious as a bad government may be, it professes, when inflicting punishment, to distinguish between the accused and the unaccused. The dynamiter knows no such discrimination. When he projects his bomb, those who are admitted to be innocent must go with those who are alleged to be guilty. Such Anarchists are moral imbecils with homicidal tendencies. Their propaganda is without reason or excuse, for so long as they are in the minority they cannot win by force, and when they hav a majority they will not need it.

With the flag of his country folded across his breast, to which were pinned the badge of the Freethought Federation of America, and the last copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, he lay as in state.—Report of the Obsequies of Charles W. Goff.

As a knight full-armed our friend sets out
To traverse the wide unknown;
No land of shadow and gloom and doubt
Can be the home of a heart so stout,
That never a fear has shown.

For all men know it, where'er men be,
That the badge and the flag and scroll,
The triple symbol of minds set free,
Hav never been borne on land and sea
As shield of a coward soul.

The Master of Life, if he be just,
Shall say to the stranger, "Stand
At the right of my throne, for gods august
The honor and fealty of him may trust
Who wrought for his nativ land.

"The badge thou wearest—nay, wear it still;
I hav given mankind Freethought.
Though other hav used that gift so ill,
Gagged it and bound it to thwart my will,
And hidden what thou hast sought.

"Fear not to read in thy cherished scroll,
I grant to thy vision youth;
They feign to know me who would control
The very pages thou dost unroll—
They find me who seek for Truth."

MR. Mr. Vennum's Mistake.

July 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Is the Bible obscene? To be sure it is, judging by the late arrest of J. B. Wise, of Kansas, for sending through the mails a verse from the Bible to the Rev. Mr. Vennum. The question is, How could Mr. Wise be indicted for stating facts found in the Bible? It is somewhat singular that, at this late day, the reverend gentleman should hav found that Bible literature is obscene, and should not be transmitted through the mails. I think Mr. Vennum has put his foot in it, having introduced a subject of the most vital importance to Bible readers. It may be asked, Could one send through the mail the language found in Deuteronomy xxii, 13-21, without being charged with the circulation of obscenity?

OSCEOLA, IA., June 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2, which you will please place to my credit. It is all that I hav at present that I can spare. I hope that shortly I may hav another that I can send you. I must hav the dear old TRUTH SEEKER as long as I can raise money to pay for it. Times are very hard here, owing to the financial condition of our nation.

This is the worst priest-ridden spot, I think, in the state. It is a small place of about twenty-eight hundred inhabitants, and they will blow in $35,000 in church building this summer. Murray, a small railroad station, ten miles west, will build a $12,000 church this summer, and when I see many robbing themselvs and families of the necessaries of life to build those churches, I think, Great is the "mystery of Go— ignorance."

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3.00 as subscription for the coming year for the old stand-by, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope that you may edit THE TRUTH SEEKER as long again as you hav been in charge of it. You will find my name in your subscription list long before Mr. Bennett was pounced on by A. Comstock. On the 26th of November coming I shall be seventy-eight years old, therefore may not much longer stick to this world, which is so beautiful for the young, and even so to the old, so long as they hav good health and be not too poor. Thought God Was Awful Good to Him.

NEW YORK, N. Y,, July 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose names and $3 cash. One dollar to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKERS you recently delivered me and $2 to assist in scattering the "Age of Reason." A little more than three years ago I was in the darkness of superstition, so dense that when I picked a berry I would think, How good God is to let me liv and pick and eat the berries he has placed here. Before I had read any of the writings of Infidels or heard Colonel Ingersoll, I dropped in occasionally for a few minutes Sunday evenings to hear Hugh O. Pentecost, when he was holding meetings in this city. At first I would stand at the door, and when he said something pointed against objectionable doctrins of the church would want to get up and say, "Let us pray." Many pointed things he said compelled my sense of truth and honesty to admit them true, however much I still opposed his aims. Finally, I felt a giving away in my orthodoxy, and the more I investigated the plainer it was to me that I had been misled by the church. When my change of views were made known to my relativs and friends it shocked them, of course, but a nature bold for truth and honesty is capable of withstanding the petty opinions instilled into, or absorbed during the period of youth.

When the Infidels of this country dare not, or at least do not spread abroad sound doctrins, our nation is in peril, as the church, controling, or trying to control, education, never fails to mix in plenty of guess-work with the facts it teaches. A young man must first seek common sense if he would hav a genuin mental foundation upon which to build his business career, and my only regret at present is that I was not converted many years before I was. There are many young men in our country to-day who hav not had the pathway of fact opened up to them, and no doubt many will liv and die in mental darkness.

Cassadaga Lake Camp—Its Growth and Social Features.

MR. EDITOR: The annual June picnic, held on the 8th, 9th, and 10th inst., was the formal inauguration of the present season of Cassadaga Camp, which has become one of the popular resorts of this continent—its primitiv features having given place to the permanent, the artistic, the esthetic, the scientific.

The rude lodgings of its incipient years are replaced by fine hotels with tiers of broad verandas. The shanty grocery has evoluted into two quite pretentious shops, where all the fruits and vegetables of the season are vended.

In the Camp there are about one hundred and fifty residences and cottages, ranging in price of structure from $400 to $3,000. Some of these residences hav elegant appointments, having genuin Irish point lace draperies of rich weave, while other windows show the delicate tints of silken folds; and within are fine upholstery, dainty carpets, pianos, and accessories. On the broad carpeted veranda are easy chairs, whose occupants look happy or grave as they discuss the questions of the hour.

The grounds are rendered enchanting by beautiful parks, elegant shade trees, blooming flowers, and singing birds. All over the island are found wells of pure, cool, sparkling water. The air is bracing and invigorating.

The Camp is supplied with a system of sewerage and an electric plant, a sanitarium, a bath house, where hot, cold, alcoholic, and vapor baths are given; so the thousands who rendezvous here for rest, social life, recuperation, and literary treats, find sanitary environments.

On the lakes are two fine steamers, built and supervised by Mr. Powell, of Cleveland, Ohio. These steamers offer delightful excursions to campers, who often, accompanied by an orchestra, glide over the sun-kissed waters as if to the cadence of sweet music.

From sixty to seventy-five families make this island their permanent residence. They are from the north, the east, the south, and the west.

Building and improvements are in constant operation. Camp, proper, opens July 20th, closing September 2d, although several hundred are now here to remain till cold weather.

In our next will speak of entertainments theatricals, literary treats, etc.

ESKRIDGE, KAN., April 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Why do Christians want their God in the Constitution? If there is a God I don't think he cares to occupy a position in the White House. There are other planets to look after without giving himself so much concern about this little grain of sand, and he ought to know that he could not be elected to any office in the United States without believing in some power higher than himself. Again, he ought to know that if he was elected to an office of any importance he would be scandalized. Why, he was here 1800 years ago and tried to officiate and they killed him. Some of the sky-pilots here claim "they don't want to use authority, they want only to be recognized in the government"—"we want equal rights." Great Scott! they hav more than equal rights now. They are protected in their religious worship as well as having their property exempt from taxation. If they don't want to exercise authority, what is their motiv? It will not do. Not long ago I was out at my barn nailing up some boards; it was Sunday. One of God's people came along on his way to church; he stopped his buggy and yelled, "Say, this is the Sabbath day; we hav a law in this country." As I was some distance from him I made no reply. I hav made some inquiry concerning this man, and I was told that he was the subject of a church trial not long since, and was also involved in a scandal. To say the least of it, he is not a gentleman, and I do not wish to know him. It would not do to giv absolute power to such men. If I work on Sunday I injure nobody, unless I work too hard, then I would injure only myself. The Christian may insist that I commit a crime against God. At the best, such a claim would be extremely foolish. Admitting it to be true, why not let me settle with God? I prefer to settle my own accounts, both in this world and in the world to come! If there is another state of existence, I want to hav the everlasting opportunity of doing right. I hav tried to be a gentleman here, and keep my accounts square. Why should the Christian try to keep me from working on Sunday? Why should he use force? It would do no good; I am an unbeliever, and if his position is true I will go to hell if I never work on Sunday. I hav almost infinit respect for every man or woman who has tried to make the world better. I am glad to say that my wife is free from superstition. She reads with pleasure the works of Ingersoll. I hav been invited to lecture in school-house District No. 49, subject: "Individuality."

C. V. WILLIAMS.

Converted by the Bible.

MILFORD, IND., March 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav had the pleasure of reading several copies of your valuable paper through the kindness of one of your regular subscribers here, who is considered by this community as an iron-clad Infidel, but who is acknowledged to be a good citizen, an inventiv genius, a generous-hearted neighbor, and one kind to everything around him. I was once a Christian—yes, I say Christian, even if I did not accept the whole theory. I belonged to an institution known as Disciples, and was always ready with my mite for the propagation and defense of that deep-water department of Christianity. The brethren and a number of the sisters predicted that I would be a shining incandescent if not an arc light in the church, but since it has been so clearly demonstrated that I did not approximate a respectable tallow-candle power, I desire to tell, through your fable-extinguisher, how it all came about. I had never read much of the Bible. My good old mother had taught me, without mental reservation, that it was the word of God; and if I pointed out anything, however erroneous, she would tell me I had no right to pry into the wisdom of God.

Of course my mother never had a single good word for the devil. She had a great many different names for him, "the bad man," "the black man," "Lucifer," "the devil," et al. She tried to photograph him on my boy-mind as one of the most horrid beings that God could conceive of, as she rather admitted that God had made him, but seems to hav "had it in for him" from the start. Nor was this picture conjured up in her own mind, for right there, in our old family Bible, we had a full page illustration of him as a kind of hybrid between the Florida alligator and a prehistoric monster, ugly enough to frighten a braver boy than it was ever my good fortune to be. So in after years I joined church, as before stated, and was right on hand every Sunday for a number of years with my mite as the Lord had prospered me, or, in other words, according to the wages I had been able to earn through the week. I was required to giv some for the missionary cause, some for the Sunday-school, but more for the preacher, for it must be remembered that he had the same taste for good things that has ever characterized the fraternity from Aaron down to the present time. But they never failed to work it out of me, even holding up the dear, good-hearted little children as examples of willingness to giv, but it was not hard to discover that the generosity of the children was largely based on the abilities of the old men, nor was it a difficult mathematical calculation to figure the whole drainage back to that source. I remember an old deacon meeting a rosy-cheeked, chubby-fisted child one day with a penny in its hand. He kindly asked the child what it was going to do with the penny. The answer was, "Doin' to det tandy wif it." "Oh," said the deacon, "don't do that, darling; save it for the Sunday-school." Right there and then, Mr. Editor, the devil must hav entered my heart, for I had to bring forth all the energy and influence of Christianity remaining in my being, to keep from taking the old deacon one on the ear to remind him to respect the rights of a child. Our old preacher was not altogether confined to the die-to-win theory, for he often taught us to be on the lookout for Christ almost any day, when we would be caught up bodily to liv with him in the air, where we would be seated at the right hand, and be allowed to roam at will, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. My wife was then young and beautiful, and on mature reflection I did not know whether that would be much of a treat or not to hav her roam around with three of the worst polygamists in the whole outfit. But I still read the Bible, till one day I struck the 24th chapter of Matthew, from the reading of which I was startled to learn that the second coming of Christ and the end of the world had passed by over 1800 years ago. I called my wife's attention to the matter. She agreed that we had missed the show by about 1800 years. The cap jewel of my faith was smashed and I so informed the church. Of course they set the old gospel carpenter to work on the wreck. He tried to make out that "this generation" meant the Jewish age, but in quoting the first chapter of the New Testament he found himself in deeper water than he had ever been. There are ten Infidels even in our little town to-day where there was one ten years ago, and I hope the day is not far distant when we will be thoroughly organized against the worst nonsense the world has ever seen.

TOM MCDONALD.

Mortuary—Charles W. Goff.

KEARNEY, NEB., July 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav to convey to you the sad intelligence of the death of my father, C. W. Goff, on June 23. He was ill only a day or two, and the end came peacefully and painlessly, and he looked as peaceful when it was over as if he had fallen into a pleasant sleep.

We had a Freethought funeral, that is, no ministers were present. The orations were pronounced by Mr. Almon Stuart, of Minden, an old Freethought friend of his, and Hon. E. C. Calkins, an able lawyer of this city. Mr. Stuart is quite an aged gentleman, and never expected to be present at the funeral of his friend.

Mr. C. Putnam, of Gibbon, will write an obituary and send you, along with copy of the addresses to print if you hav space. Would like to hav you print them if you can without too much trouble, as many of his friends hav asked us if they would be printed. It is too bad that father had to leave his work so soon; he was doing much to free men's minds from religious and p litical superstition. As you know, he had stirred up quite an enthusiasm among people out here, and they manifested their respect by coming many miles (from Minden) to see him laid away.

His ailment was a slight rheumatism of the arm, but it went to his heart suddenly and was the cause of death. It happened that the two nights and days following his death were cool, calm, and pleasant, while the third day, the day of the funeral, was one of the most beautiful I ever hav seen here in this windy country, as it was perfectly calm, but the next day the wind blew furiously all day. So the pious people cannot say that either nature or their God was anything but kind to him in the end. Very sincerely yours,

HELEN M. GOFF.

Another friend of, and zealous worker in, the cause of Freethought has passed away. Chas. W. Goff, of Kearney, Neb., died on the 23d of June, 1894, of heart-disease. A large concourse of friends, who hold his memory sacred, were at the funeral to attest their sincere affection—to share the parting grief—to hallow the ineffaceable impress of the last good-bye.

Mr. Goff had often expressed the desire that he might die without pain. Was ever the prayer of Christian so fully answered? The angel of death was at the bidding of nature, and touched him gently as the dews of night. It is the lot of man that all must die. What nobler work of life, then, than by thought, word, and deed to plant the seed of lament which, when wet by the dews of death-sorrow, shall spring up in the hearts of the living and shower sweet blossoms of remembrance upon the consecrated grave? To this end we can truly say, Well done and faithful was his work. Into the arms of nature we consign his body, but in the all-pervading intelligence the leaven of his spirit will continue to "work out a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." With the flag of his country folded across his breast, to which were pinned the badge of the Freethought Federation of America, and the last copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, he lay as in state—one of nature's noblemen, amid flowery tokens of love's sorrow, profusely laid upon casket and table.

His was a picture of death that needed not the touch of gods or angels to make it more beautiful. His wishes were scrupulously followed out in every feature of the solemn occasion. What sublimer test of an independent and fearless mind, what more touching regard in the hearts made sad?

All present could not but be impressed with the serious dignity, the religious fervency, the inexpressible pathos of the occasion, and I doubt not that many a heart welled up the involuntary wish—May I die the death of such a man, and may my last end be like his.

He leaves a wife and daughter esteemed in society, bright in intellect and noble in the virtues of heart and mind.

ADDRESS OF MR. ALMON STUART.

MY FRIENDS: When a few short weeks ago my friend, who now lies cold and lifeless before us, drove up before my home and invited me to ride with him, as I accepted his invitation and enjoyed the interchange of thought sacred to friendship, how little I dreamed how soon I should be called upon to redeem a promis made him then. The thought that his promis to officiate over my remains if he survived me seemed so much more likely that my promis appeared safe; he so much the younger man, and I with stumbling steps so near the end. And if, in paying my feeble tribute to his worth, that promis seems a rash one, you will attribute it to my inability to do justice to his merits. He was my friend. Into the inner sanctuary of his confidence he had deemed me worthy of admittance. My friends, on so sad and solemn an occasion as this, I deem it unfit to indulge in remarks of a proselyting nature; the parading of theories under the guise of facts is calculated only to wound the feelings or antagonize those who may differ from us; and so in my remarks I shall endeavor, as far as possible, in justice to my friend and his convictions of truth, to deal with no controversial questions. We stand here to-day in the presence of that great mystery of mysteries that men call death. Our lives are hedged about with mysteries which we cannot solve. Forms regnant with life, then rigid in death. And yet, are we sure there is any death? Our eyes are gladdened at sight of waving fields of grain, flush in their beauty, green in their luxuriance; the genial rains and sunshine robe those fields in gold; the grain is ripe; each kernel holds a germ of life; and yet the stalk, with all its leaves on which the kernels grew, is dead; the grain becomes food for man, and in a few short hours it is blood and flesh and thought.

"O mystery wondrous! Transformation strange!
Is not all life and death eternal change?"

My friends, I come not here to eulogize my friend; his life is his best eulogy; but you will pardon my mentioning some of the traits of his character which make his memory so dear to me. "He is a free man whom the truth makes free, and all are slaves beside." In a few days throughout all our land the cannon's roar, the waving flags, the oratory from thousands of rostrums, will proclaim the anniversary of our nation's birth, a mighty, a great people, free. Many years ago I heard a hymn sung which thrilled me with its sentiments. A small part of that hymn I yet remember, and you will please excuse my substitution of a few words in place of one or two which friend Goff and myself held as mythical.

"God made all nature free;" substituting

"All nature's realms are free,
He made all nature free,
Let earth reply to the sea and sky,
God made all nature free.
And shall the winds and the sea be free,
With all its rolling waves?
Shall nature sing such a glorious song
And men be willing slaves?
Ten thousand voices answer, No,
Till every rock and tree
Shall echo back the joyful sound,
God made all nature free."

Friend Goff, who leaves us so many precious memories, was a free man. Alas! how few are free. Slaves to passion, slaves of prejudice, slaves of superstition, slaves of ignorance, slaves of party, slaves to priestcraft, hugging their fetters, fancying they are free. Yes, my friend was free, honorable, faithful, truthful, loyal, and courageous; for freemen ever must be brave, not alone that physical bravery, laughing at danger and defying death, which I hav witnessed on so many battle-fields, but that higher, nobler, moral courage so few possess; a courage that can face the monster public opinion in defense of one's convictions; and this my friend possessed in an eminent degree.

There is yet a nobler trait of character, a higher standard of excellence to which but few attain, the crowning glory of the human race—honesty. A great poet has well said, "An honest man is the noblest work of God," which our great Ingersoll has paraphrased thus, "An honest God is the noblest work of man." I hav lived nearly seventy-three years, and in all the varied experiences of life, in an extensiv acquaintance and association, I hav found but few who were mentally, intellectually, free and honest. Of how very few of all that number could it be truly said—an honest man! I hav read much of what we term theologic lore; books claimed by their believers as revelations of the various Gods, but I hav never yet found an honest God. I doubt much if a dishonest God could make an honest man. I feel sure an honest man would not make a dishonest God. Our friend was an honest man—honest with himself and all with whom he came in contact. In the foul fields of superstition described in sacred books, where thorns and briars and noxious weeds luxuriate, we sometimes come across a flower of such rare beauty that we pluck it from its base surroundings to grace the brows of those we love, and so from the Bible field I glean this flower to place upon the casket of my friend: "To those, who by a faithful continnance in well-doing seek for glory, honor, immortality, eternal life"—not an eternal life of conscious, individual existence such as is implied in the quotation, for of that neither friend Goff nor myself kuew or believed aught.

O friend, thine was a "faithful continuance in well-doing," and thou hast gained the crown of immortality, a free man, an honorable, faithful, truthful, loyal, brave, and honest man. Can I, need I, add more? Thou hast left a priceless inheritance to thy loved ones and a noble example for us to strive to imitate:

Rest, brother, rest. We know 'tis best
Each halt we make on life's hard march to lay our burdens down,
So shall we better bear the cross and win the victor's crown,
We faithful all shall wear who make the quest.
Rest, brother rest.

ADDRESS OF HON. E. C. CALKINS.

In the early afternoon of life, while yet the sun was shining brightly, and before the shadows began to grow long upon his pathway, our friend fell asleep and now lies silent here. Neither disease nor wasting pain, nor yet the infirmities of age, had darkened his journey, but in the full tide of life and strength and usefulness, he laid his burden down and is at rest. To him who knew no fear it were happier so. Nature was kind in sparing him the pain and suffering that often wears out the blessing of life, and makes of it a useless and heavy burden.

In the mystery of death, which comes to all, there is infinit pathos, and for countless ages the human mind has beat its bruised and bleeding wings against the impassable barrier of the unknown, only to fall back breathless and exhausted upon its imagination with which it has sought to people the great beyond and fill the void of its ignorance.

The nations which worshiped in the ruined temples of India are gone; the people upon the banks of the sacred Nile, who for a hundred generations filled the temples of Isis, are no more; Zeus and Jove no longer interfere in the affairs of men, and some hav come to believe that the greatest happiness and sole peace possible in life is the consciousness of a life well lived and a work well done.

Of these was our brother here. He did not hesitate to utter what he thought the highest truth. He realized the fact that opinion expressed is a part of that force which works social changes and causes intellectual improvement, and that he might properly giv utterance to his innermost conviction, since each man is one of the myriad agencies through which works the universal cause. He believed that in uttering the highest truth, let what might come of it, he was playing the right part in the world, and there is no sublimer faith than this.

But not alone was he faithful in the world of thought and intellect. There came to him the full share of those prosaic burdens, the sum of which we call duty; it was for him to labor and practice self-denial for the good of those dependent on him by the ties of kindred or of sympathy, and by this test he never failed. In the hour of his country's peril he did not falter, and a part of the glory of those old heroic days was his.

Grief comes to sit in the household where the place of father and mother is vacant. So it has always been and always must be. Time alone can temper mourning and heal the lacerated ties of affection. But in the after days the recollection of those loved and lost comes like a benediction to console and cheer; we hear their step and the music of their voices, and in memory of their gentle deeds of love and kindness they liv with us again.

And now we bid our sleeping friend good night. We know not of the future, but Hope, the eternal, sits enthroned in the heavens, giving us the assurance of the resurrection of perennial nature and imperishable humanity.

The funeral services were held at the residence on Avenue F and Thirtieth street, Tuesday, June 26th, at 11 A.M., and were in accordance with the wishes of the deceased. The services were opened with a moment of silent thought, after which Mrs. Swenson sang in her soft, sweet tones "Lead, Kindly Light." After the addresses by Mr. Almon Stuart, of Minden, and the Hon. E. C. Calkins, of Kearney the services closed by Mrs. Swenson singing the hymn "Life" by Warren Sumner Barlow, beginning:

"Life illumes the radiant dew-drop,
Is the fragrance of a flower;
Animates all forms of being,
Is the essence of all power," and the benediction by Mr. Calkins:

"Now may the love of truth, justice, freedom and humanity abide with us all forever." C. PUTNAM.

Death of Hon. R. R. Laughlin.

FOREST GROVE, OR., June 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: It is my sad duty to report to the many readers of your valuable paper and the field workers that hav visited and lectured here, the death of Robert R. Laughlin, who passed to the silent land, June 19th, at his home, North Yamhill, Or. Mr. Laughlin has always been a broad-minded man and an avowed Liberal for thirty years. There is a large circle of relativs, the majority of whom are also Liberals. He leaves a wife and seven children—four sons and three daughters. I was telephoned to come and make the remarks at the grave. In company with D. C. Stewart and wife I drove to North Yamhill, and beside the open grave, in the presence of hundreds of people, sadly and sorrowfully gave the remains back to mother earth. I send synopsis of address.

MRS. A. E. BARKER.

This beautiful summer day, when all nature is dressed in her most beautiful garb, the air redolent with the perfume of flowers and harvests bountiful, we are led to contemplate man and his position in the universe—man with his intelligence, his emotions, his joys, and his sorrows, and his life with its sunshine and shadows. In our contemplation we are led to ask, "What is the most important event in the life of man; the one in which is incurred the greatest responsibility?" We can but answer, "It is at that time in life when through nature's sublime laws we bring into this world a new life." We look upon man in his infancy and helplessness; we see him evolve into childhood with his precocity and impetuosity; we follow him into his youth and watch with anxiety and mark with care and tenderness his every step until he reaches his majority; then on into the meridian, where he stands before the world in the full glory and grandeur of the noontide of life; then on down the western slope till the sun is set and the day is done.

We meet to-day to pay the last tribute of respect to the mortal remains of Robert Rankin Laughlin, born in Lincoln county, Missouri, Oct. 23, 1828. A man whose life and character we love to contemplate. A man who was never hampered by superstition; one who was made of that stern material necessary for an Oregon pioneer; he came to the far west in 1847 with others, and entered into the hardships and privations incidental thereto with the spirit of true manhood. His hand was ever stretched forth to help those in sickness, in distress, and in need; he knew no creed but honor and integrity. It needed such men to build up the great commonwealth of the state of Oregon. The people manifested their appreciation of his ability as law maker, when, by their suffrages, they elected him three times to the Oregon legislature. He was a devoted husband, a loving father, a kind brother, a noble citizen, a lover of humanity. He leaves to his children a legacy more precious than jewels, and more lasting than the whitest of marble monuments, more brilliant than gilded dome. We ask "What is life?" The greatest philosopher of any age has said, "Life is continued activities." Scientists tell us "a force once generated never ceases." Then, what is death? It can but be the continued activities of life's forces. There can be no person of any belief whatsoever, but has a hope that when this life is ended he will again meet and recognize those with whom he has journeyed side by side through life.

The Christian bases this hope upon a promis; the scientist upon a knowledge of his investigations. Let us then hope that life's fondest ideals will be realized. To the bereaved wife and children we can say we realize how deep is your affliction, how sad is your loneliness. The dear form once so fondly cherished will return no more; but the hope is certain that the spirit with others is waiting your coming just beyond the veil. We offer you our sympathies, we drop a tear for you in your grief. Let us throw around you that mantle of affection to shield you in your trials. Nature's laws are sublime and the noblest of human emotions is that desire within the human soul to comfort the sorrowing, aid the helpless, relieve the distressed, thus binding the race into one universal brotherhood. His was a nature exalted and ambitious. He loved nature in all her beauties. He loved the grand old mountains as they seemed to vie with each other to reach a higher altitude, and saw them reflected in human life. Their language to him was "come up higher." Every effort of his was to reach a higher altitude. Let us endeavor to embody his virtues within us, let us bask in the sunlight of truth and help others along the rugged path of life.

The remains were interred by the Odd Fellows according to their burial service.

Children's Corner.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

He and She.

He was out on a hunt, 'twas an evening in June;
She was sitting alone and humming a tune—
Lillero, lallero, loo.
He was charmed by her song and entered the room;
She cried out "O Lord!" to the man in the moon—
Lillero, lallero, loo.
He was dressed in a suit of velvety brown;
She was not pleased at that, and gave him a frown—
Lillero, lallero, loo.
He came nearer to her, then stood by a chair;
She was still more alarmed and up stood her hair—
Lillero, lallero, loo.
He looked straight at her with a twinkling eye;
She called loud for help, but no help made reply—
Lillero, lallero, loo.
He said not a word, but he picked up a crumb;
She picked up the shovel with fingers and thumb—
Lillero, lallero, loo.
He no longer had fun, for the terrible whack
She suddenly dealt him had broken his back—
Lillero, lallero, loo.
He has gone, but which way the priest cannot tell;
She takes no thought whether to heaven or—well—
Lillero, lallero, loo.
He was only a mouse, and he died in June;
She can still sit alone, and she hums the same tune—
Lillero, lallero, loo.

Crime and the Criminal.

[CONCLUDED.]

Still another defect of our present system is that we make no provision to help a convict after he is discharged from the prison. We turn him loose in the world with a blemished name, and with only a few dollars in his pocket. Wherever he goes, as soon as it is known that he is an ex-convict, that fact alone serves to bar him from employment, and then, without work and with no means of subsistence, he is bound to return to crime, and then over the road he goes once more, only to be discharged when his term expires and to follow the same course again.

Of late years the Prisoners' Aid societies hav taken up the convict after his discharge from prison and aided him to get and keep employment, and by this means the society has greatly decreased the number of convicts who are recommitted. If these benevolent societies will enlarge the scope of their work so as to include all the prisons in the United States they will in a short time make a marked decrease in the number of convicts in our prisons, for, as you will remember, over fifty per cent of all convicts discharged are recommitted.

At present we take few measures to prevent crime; we wait till a crime has been committed, and then punish the offender. In place of this we should try to nip crime in the bud, as the prevention of a disease is many times better than the cure. One method is to reform the youthful offender, whose mind is easily shaped and trained. Under the new system, the youthful offender, in place of being sentenced to a term in the penitentiary, is sent to a reform, or, more properly speaking, an industrial school. Although he is kept in confinement, still he is treated with kindness and given a great many liberties. He is taught all the principal branches of elementary knowledge and his moral welfare is the object of special concern. He is taught the difference between right and wrong, and to avoid doing wrong, not from fear of punishment, but because it is wrong. He is also taught some useful trade, so that when he is released he will not only be morally and mentally better, but also able to make his way in the world. As the nature of each youth is different, it requires more or less time to train them, so they are generally sent to the school for an indefinit period and kept there till fully reformed.

About eighty-five per cent of the youths discharged from our reform schools hav turned out to be fairly good citizens, so by this means alone we hav gained a great advantage over crime, and hav also saved the state expense and burden.

As we hav already seen that drunkenness is one of the great causes of crime, the next reform is such restriction and limitation of the sale of intoxicating liquors as will keep men who are so disposed from drinking enough to make them drunk. One method of preventing drunkenness is to treat the drunkard himself, and thus try to destroy his appetite for liquor. The popular method of accomplishing this is the Keeley cure; but I am not prepared to say whether it is a success or not, as it has not been in existence long enough to giv us sufficient data on which to base an opinion. The other method of counteracting the habit of drink is to limit and fence in the sale of it, so as to make it impossible for men to get intoxicated.

After having thus overcome to some extent the effect of bad company and drink, there still remains a residue of adult criminals to be dealt with. Our present method of trying to deter them from crime by meting out severe punishment has proven an utter failure, so we must try to find some other method that will be more of a success. The first duty of our state is to protect its citizens from the criminal classes, even at the expense of the criminal's personal liberty. The only course left is to try to reform the criminal. Expense should not be considered, if only the desired end can be obtained; for every criminal reformed and made self-supporting adds to the wealth of the community, and the cost of reforming him is small in comparison to the cost to the state of keeping him imprisoned.

We hav made one great advance in prison reform—that is, all the prisoners are required to work, and are thus made to earn a part of the money which the state must pay out to keep them in confinement. The first step in the matter of reforming the criminal is to separate the convicts into classes according to their characters and previous records, so that the older and hardened convicts may not contaminate the better ones. The convict should not be sentenced for any definit period, as it should be left to the discretion of the managers to discharge the prisoner as soon as they consider him reformed, whether it takes one month or twenty years. New York state has adopted this method to the extent of allowing the convicts to be discharged when they are considered cured by the managers of the reformatory; the only restriction being that the convict cannot be detained for a longer period than that for which he is sentenced. In the New York prison the average time of detention under the new method was fifteen months, and out of the 1,205 convicts thus treated only 37 are known to hav been again sent to prison. This splendid showing indicates that the reform method, so far as tried, has proven a great success. Under it a great deal of attention is given to the convict's moral welfare, and he is governed by the hope of reward and mitigation of punishment, in place of the fear of punishment.

It might be asked what shall be done with those who cannot be reformed, and who continue to be criminals and transgress the laws? The only way of treating this class is either to imprison them for life as dangerous to society or else to kill them. The former is cruel to the prisoner and expensiv to the state, while the latter is considered inhuman. But still it seems that when a person has become a criminal and it is impossible to reform him, then the state, to protect itself and society, should dispose of him in the cheapest and quickest way, which is to deprive him of life.

Having hurriedly reviewed the subject, I hope that this paper will be the means of awakening some thought on this vital subject and thus prove of a benefit to you. Let us hope, too, that we may continue to improve in our reformatory methods, and that we may at last succeed to that extent that we will hav no further use for policemen, jailers, or penitentiaries, and that all men will be just and honest and treat one another as brothers. WM. L. PALM.

What the Little Folks are Saying.

DISAPPOINTING.

She was a very cultured and fashionable young lady, albeit she was only six years old, and she was a resident of New York. A gentleman calling on her parents had an opportunity to hav a brief tete-a-tete with her.

"I presume," he said, "that when you grow up you will marry, as all little girls do?"

"No," she replied languidly. "No, I hardly think I shall."

"Indeed! That will be so disappointing."

"Possibly it may be to mamma, and to the young gentleman, but not to me, I fancy," and she lolled back in her chair quite tired to death, don't you know.—Detroit Free Press.

EVOLUTION AS UNDERSTOOD BY A CHILD.

At the breakfast table in a St. Anthony hill residence the little five-year-old daughter of the house was asked if she would hav some corn bread and sirup. Turning up her nose in disgust, she replied:

"No, it tastes too much like old carpets."

"How do you know what old carpets taste like—did you ever eat one?" inquired an elder brother.

"Why, yes," said the youthful epicure. "Before I was an angel I was a moth, and when I was a moth I ate carpets and other things."

And they let it go at that.—St. Paul Dispatch.

CONDITIONS CONTRASTED.

A little girl took tea with her young friend who was the daughter of a grocery man. The latter asked a blessing at the table, which was something new for the little visitor. She asked her young friend afterward what it was that her papa was saying at the table. "He was thanking God for our food," was the reply. "Oh! was he?" said the visitor. "My papa pays for ours."—Springfield Union.

Naughty Maudie and the Sparrows.

A Brooklyn society woman of true culture met her husband (a professional man) at the door the other night as he returned from business, and with a serious face proceeded to hold a private consultation with him upon the all-important and absorbing topic, their only child, a midget of a few summers. It was decided that after dinner papa should interview the little one and correct some faults of speech which she had fallen into. He heard that she had taken to using strong words, but he didn't believe that. After supper he led his little daughter to the library, and standing her in front of him seriously said, looking her in the eyes:

"Maudie, I am sorry to say it, but they tell me you use swear words. Is that so?"

Maudie, with her hands clasped behind her and her round eyes fixed on her father, said defiantly:

"No, 'tain't."

"But," persisted her father, "they say you certainly do."

"Who says so?" demanded Maudie.

"Oh, a little bird told me," said her father knowingly.

"Well," with very emphatic emphasis, "it must hav been one of those —— sparrows, then."—Boston Record.

Correspondence.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 50, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I saw my other letters in print I thought I would write again.

There is a church right across the road from our house, and on Sundays we can sit on our porch and hear the church bells ringing and hear the people sing.

It is called Christian Hill where we liv now, because so many Christians liv around here.

The weather changes very rapidly up here.

I am going to correspond with a girl named Nellie G. Rukke.

For fear my letter will find its way to the dreadful wastebasket, I will now close.

CHEAP EDITION.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

"With Daughter's Babe Upon His Knee."

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

AMERICAN liberty is all right, but it does not mean unbridled license to plunder and assassinate others.—Galveston News.

THY brother is thine other self; his fate and thine are one.
Do, then, thy duty to thyself, and all thy work is done. —Lara.

LET the priests of any religion hav power, and let men speak for themselvs in opposition to their doctrins; in this case persecution is sure to follow.—Henry Lord Brougham and Vaux.

THE brotherhood of man means little to some who are loudest in its acclaim. There are spiritual autocrats, who do what they can to keep alive distinctions of wealth and race.—Horace L. Traubel.

HATE not each other because you differ in opinion—rather love each other; for it is impossible that in such a variety of sentiments there should not be some fixed point on which all men ought to unite.—Zoroaster.

WHILE it is requisite that free play should be given to conservativ thought and action, progressiv thought and action must also hav free play. Without the agency of both there cannot be those continual readaptations which orderly progress demands.—Herbert Spencer.

PRUDENCE does not go behind nature and ask whence it is. It takes the laws of the world whereby man's being is conditioned, as they are, and keeps these laws that it may enjoy their proper good. It respects space and time, climate, want, sleep, the law of polarity, growth, and death.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

WOULD you endeavor to make man a creature of dogmas and laws, of constitutions and articles of faith, or would you arouse in him his latent energies and aid to see him fulfilled in self-graee and self-poise? Would you giv him charity or equipment? Would you maim him and then lend him your arm, or would you prefer to nourish him to giant self-power, so that your tenders of help would grow superfluous and be effaced?—Horace L. Traubel.

PEOPLE prate about liberty, and define that liberty as the liberty of the particular class they are speaking for. The only liberty worth having in this country is the equal liberty of all men alike. Liberty in its philosopical and common-sense definition consists in that right of each individual to exercise the greatest freedom of action up to, and not beyond, that point that impinges upon the like exercise of freedom of action of every other man. Beyond that it is the destruction of the liberty of the weak by the strongest, the subversion of the very theory of a republic, and a return to primeval anarchy on the one hand, or as an alternativ, to despotism on the other.—Senator Cushman K. Davis.

IN short, neither a pyramid nor a poem, a Cheops, nor a canticle, is the best and most enduring monument a man can raise to convince the dim future that he must once hav lived and moved and had his being, that he had lived nobly, that he had moved vigorously, and that his being had been replete with vital energy and the cosmic potentialities which carried the current of his blood down the sluice of human veins, red, rich, generous, untainted, to him of the strong arm, the broad chest, and broad brow who to-day stands in the front files of the world and does the most valiant work the world has done in its service. The only real monument—more enduring than the everlasting brass—man can raise is the monument of his lineal posterity.—Saladin.

IF a man thinks at all, he must recognize that the president of a republic is not responsible for all its social evils. The existing systems of society did not begin with his election, and will not end with his removal. His assassination is therefore a monstrous wickedness, a detestable injustice. His slayers play the part of judge, jury, and executioner. They immolate him on the altar of their own faith, where they hav only the right to pour their own blood. They imitate, and even better, the worst examples of the old régime. And in doing so they play the game of reaction, by throwing crowds of timid people back from the line of progress, and giving a pretext for fresh invasions on liberty. Nor is the wickedness of assassination any greater than its folly. Even a secret murder society cannot cow a whole nation. It cannot even terrorize a despotism, unless it is a mere historical accident, the temporary triumph of one man. Slay even the czar of Russia tomorrow, and his successor will promptly ascend the throne, and perhaps rule still more despotically.—George W. Foote.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject without much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the use, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress?—by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman,

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for is bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

Pleasure and Progress" has 398 pages, is splendidly printed from large, clear type, on excellent paper, and costs, bound in cloth, $1; paper covers, 50 cents.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

THE DEATH OF ADAM.

Adam had finished a hard day's work, and sat half asleep in his arm chair. He was 930 years of age, and consequently was beginning to fail a bit. He had nearly "dozed off" when Mrs. Adam entered and handed him a letter. He at once opened it, and read aloud as follows:

"LAND OF NOD, March, 925.

"Dear Father: I take this opportunity of penning you a few lines. I wrote 400 years ago, but perhaps the letter got miscarried. I often think of you and mother, and would be delighted to receive a letter from you now and then—say once a century. I hav not forgotten that unfortunate affair with brother Abel. I know it was wrong of me to kill him. But it was provoking to an enthusiastic agriculturist like me to see the Lord accepting his half-starved sheep and rejecting my champion turnips. I hav got married since coming here, and am now the father of a family of three. My eldest will be 400 years old next September; and is beginning to think about the ladies. My next—a daughter—was born 150 last birthday. She goes messages and rocks the baby. Baby, dear thing, is 50 years old this very day, and is getting over its teething beautifully. My lad—who you must know is a bit of a wag—bids me send his best wishes 'to grandfather and his rib.' I remain,

"Your loving son, CAIN."

Upon reading this epistle Adam began to sob bitterly, exclaiming every now and then, "My poor lad; my poor lad; my poor, poor Cain." "Come, don't be a softy," said Eve reproachfully; "you've nothing to make you cry like a big baby." "You shut up," said Adam, "that's no way to talk to an orphan like me." "Well, what makes you get on that way about Cain? I think we've reason to be thankful that he has got married and settled down comfortably." "Why, lass," said Adam, the tears streaming from his eyes, "it's the thought o' his being married that cuts me so." "In other words," retorts Eve, sarcastically, "you hav experienced matrimony to be a curse. Thank you, sir." "You don't understand me, lass." "That I don't." "Well, I'll make thee," said Adam, taking Eve's hand in his own. "Am I not the first man?" Eve assented. "And you the first woman?" Eve smiled affirmativly. "Well, then," continued Adam, "can't you see that when my poor lad went to that d——d land of Nod he must hav married an animal of some sort. Just fancy your own flesh and blood settling down in life with a baboon!" Here Adam went into fits. Eve saw that his condition was serious. She did not get medical aid, because there wasn't any. She would hav unfastened his shirt-collar, only he hadn't one. The good woman did what she could, but it was of no avail. In a few moments Adam, to use the pathetic words of the poet—

"Slept the endless sleep that knows no sorrow."

The sad affair filled every heart with sorrow except the undertaker's. The unseemly callousness of that gentleman may be excused when it is remembered that Adam's death furnished him with a second order since he set up in business. It is calculated that had Adam lived a day longer this worthy would hav been a bankrupt.—Wallace Nelson, in Melbourne Liberator.

LOGIC OF DEATH,

—OR,—

Why Should the Atheist Fear to Die?

By J. G. HOLYOAKE. Price, 5 cents

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. IT is rumored that China has declared war against Japan. Preparations for the struggle are activly proceeding. Corea yields to the demands of Japan. United States and British marines hav been landed at Seoul (capital of Corea) to protect their consulates.

THE Senate committee on the sugar trust scandal is again in session. Charges of bribery are in the air. Senator Allen of this committee handed in a report in which he exonerated Senators Ransom and Jones and Secretary Carlisle, but states that Senators Quay and McPherson speculated in sugar stocks.

CHIEF HAZEN, of the United States Secret Service Division, demands that Mississippi shall discontinue the issuance of her warrants and shall forward the plates to Washington. It is alleged that the warrants resemble U. S. treasury notes, and hence violate the law against counterfeiting. Governor Stone protests and appeals to Secretary Carlisle.

THERE is serious trouble at Enid and Pond Creek, Oklahoma, growing out of the refusal of the Rock Island road to stop its trains as the towns order. Bridges hav been blown up and other violence committed. The mayor of Enid asks for an increased force of U. S. troops. The mayor of Pond Creek also asks for federal soldiers to help enforce ordinance against the railroad.

THE Senate, by a majority composed of the Populists and part of the Democrats and Republicans, has refused to act favorably on Secretary Morton's recommendation for a decrease of the yearly appropriation for the agricultural department. One million dollars has been voted for the destruction of the Russian thistle. It is not improbable that the House will reduce or strike out this item.

THE House and Senate conferees on the tariff bill failed to agree. Chairman Wilson of the House representativs presented a report and urged the Democrats to stand by the House bill. His appeal was vigorously applauded. He read a letter written by President Cleveland to himself, and dated July 2d, in which the president said that the Senate bill was a betrayal of the party's principles, and urged that a stand be taken for free raw materials. He declared that the principle was a fundamental doctrin of the party. Many Senators are very angry because of the president's attitude and utterances. Senator Hill supports the president in the demand for free raw materials and Senator Vilas has moved that the one-eighth per cent differential on sugar be stricken out of the Senate bill. The Democratic press is solid in support of the president and House and against the Senate.

THE American Railway Union strike is over, practically. There are a few points at which troops are yet needed, especially along the Northern Pacific. Some other roads are experiencing a little difficulty in moving their trains. In California, one of the most persistent storm centers, the strike was officially declared off last Saturday. The most important incidents of the week are here enumerated: The attempt to resume work in the Pullman shop has resulted in several small riots, necessitating the intervention of state troops. Laundresses, oilers, ballasters and other non-union workers were attacked by strikers. There were riots in Oakland over the attempt to move trains. Troops dispersed the crowds. The House of Representativs, by a nearly unanimous vote, approved of the action of President Cleveland. E. V. Debs, and his cabinet—G. W. Howard, S. Keliher, and L. W. Rogers—were committed to jail on July 17th for contempt of court, in violating injunction order. They could hav given bail, but refused. The eminent jurist, Thomas M. Cooley, warmly indorses the action of President Cleveland. Regulars hav been withdrawn from Chicago to Fort Sheridan, near the city. Federal troops are concentrating in Idaho and Montana. Roughs or strikers caused a serious fire in Chicago stock yards July 18th. All but one of the directory of the American Railway Union hav been arrested for contempt and conspiracy. Most of them are out on bail. President Gompers of the Federation of Labor issues an appeal for funds to pay for the defense of Debs and associates in the coming trials. The American Labor Union, a new organization, will take in all but railway men. It is thought that it will absorb the Knights of Labor. Judge Seeds at Santa Fe sentenced fourteen strikers to imprisonment varying from fifteen to fifty days. Offense, contempt of court.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Journal of Freethought and Reform.

Vol. 21. No. 31 {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, August 4, 1894. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 Per Year.

TOO SOON FOR THE RESURRECTION OF PURITANISM.

UNCLE SAM (to Puritanism): See here! You just keep your coffin on! The "kingdom" hasn't come yet, and that racket you hear is not Gabriel's trumpet by a darned sight.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies will soon adjourn, but the people of the country will remain in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

Samuel P. Putnam has latterly been ranging around in the woods of Michigan. He seems to enjoy it, which is probably largely due to the fact that he has found a place free from the shadows of the church and the meddlesome scheming of the preacher. It is only on the far frontier that such elysiums can be found. As soon as the country becomes thickly settled and there is enough money ahead to build conventicles Mrs. Grundy and the parson assert their power, and business and professional men and politicians respectfully doff their hats and shut their mouths. But it will not be always thus, we hope. The extension of the circulation of Liberal papers and the distribution of good books will enlighten and liberate. We are still offering THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" for $6.50, cash in advance. This secures the enrollment of the subscriber's name in the book. Since the last report we hav recorded the names of Wm. H. Baier, of Minnesota, and J. A. Raves, of Utah.

The Sad Dilemma of the Educated Christian.

The uninformed Christian has few difficulties to contend against. His capacity for belief is commensurate with his ignorance. He is told that the Bible is inspired, is the word of God, and he accepts the statement as true. His lack of education and his wholly undeveloped critical faculty protect him from the skepticism which reading of the Bible would otherwise develop. He is defenseless in the grasp of his leaders. He meekly pays his devotion and his money to the underwriters of the church to insure him against conflagration in an asserted post-earthly existence.

With the leaders themselvs it is vastly different. They are confronted with a thousand unconquerable enemies, and they stumble against a thousand insurmountable obstacles. They must either tunnel under or make a detour of each of these mountains of fact. They must constantly parley, feint, compromise. In the center front they face with blanched cheeks the swiftly augmenting, never retrograding, slowly but relentlessly advancing, armies of natural science; on the left front and flank they press in vain against the batteries of historical and literary criticism; on the right front and flank they look upon the perpendicular, unscalable walls of granit reared by logic and philosophy, while in their rear their only reserve is a disorganized mass of camp followers, who are indifferent, tired, fearful, famished, or disgusted, and who wait only to be sure the battle is lost to openly join the victorious forces of the foe. The chiefs are at their wits' ends. They hav compromised until further compromise seems impossible, so much hav they surrendered. The six days of creation are gone; the earth is no longer flat, and it has ceased to be the pivot of the solar system; Moses yields the claim to the authorship of the Pentateuch; the flood story is no longer believed; the devil is almost dead, and the fires of hell hav been transformed into the fangs of conscience; the "conflict between religion and science" goes on, and so far religion has not a single victory to her credit, and few and scattered are the scholars within the church who dare claim that the Bible is wholly inerrant. In practical life, the Christianity of the Bible and of the first centuries is a thing of the past. But the name remains, and it is still the rallying-cry of priests ambitious for power and of politicians anxious for the suffrages of the masses who still believe that it represents vital truths.

What is to be done? What can be done? What is the next concession to be made? Can anything be saved? Did the Bible reveal to us one truth? If so, and if we surrender everything else, will criticism leave this for our consolation? Will evolution spare to us what criticism may fail to take from us? We will now see what two Christians hav to say in answer to these questions which their fellows despairingly ask, first permitting another Christian to outline the issue. The editor of the religious department of the Literary Digest says:

"There are two questions that go to the very root of Christianity. These are: (1) Does evolution leave us a God, such a God as a Christian can implicitly believe in? (2) Does criticism leave us a Bible, containing a special religious message? Two contributions hav recently been made toward answering these questions in the affirmativ, which claim special recognition. These are: Professor Drummond's 'Lowell Lectures on the Ascent of Man,' and 'The Message of Israel,' by Miss Wedgwood."

It will not escape notice that all that is asked of evolution is to leave the Christian a god in whom he can believe, and of the critic to leave a Bible containing "a special religious message." We shall see further along that all the rest of the Bible is to be sacrificed, if need be, for the sake of this one message. The Literary Digest proceeds to quote from a review of Miss Wedgwood's book, written for the Fortnightly Review by Prof. A. B. Bruce, D.D. The professor says that the work in question is "not less valuable, as an aid to faith," than Drummond's "Ascent of Man." He adds:

"The position taken up by the author in this book is, in brief, that Israel's election stands, and that she has a message, criticism notwithstanding. As to the election, there need be no difficulty about that, if, with our author, we hold that every nation has its special vocation, could we only discover it, and very notably the great classic nations of Greece and Rome. In that case, the only question is as to the nature of the vocation, the purpose of the election. Israel's vocation has always been understood to lie within the sphere of religion, as that of Greece is the sphere of art, and of Rome in legislation and government. If Israel has a message of permanent value for the world, it is one relating to God and the Eternal. And the contention of the writer is not only that Israel still has a message, but that the message has been made clear by all that modern criticism has discovered in reference to the Hebrew sacred literature."

The assumptions, in their order, are that each nation has a message, that the message of Israel pertains to religion, that Israel's religious message relates to "God and the eternal," and that modern criticism has made clear this message. It may be perfectly true, and it probably is true, that each nation, or more correctly, each race, has a genius for some particular work and that it excels all other races therein, and it may be further true that the Semites had a special faculty for the development of religious conceptions, and that they, more than any other people of old, elaborated the monotheistic idea, but it is certain that many of those who contributed to the works which together constitute the present Old Testament were polytheists. Jahveh was simply a tutelary divinity, bigger, more powerful and wise, more bloodthirsty and cruel, than his rivals, the "false gods" of the neighboring nations and tribes. However, we are not called upon to pursue this side issue at length in this article, which has another purpose, that being to show that scholarly Christians are now trying to save the dogma of the revelation through the Bible of the concept of the oneness of God at the expense of the other tenets of Christianity and of all the rest of the Bible. Professor Bruce says that the belief of Miss Wedgwood is that "criticism has given us our Bible" and he quotes this paragraph from her book in substantiation of his statement:

"It is in the belief that the work of criticism is fitted to restore to us our Bible with the freshness of a new Reformation and the preciousness of an ancient faith, that one who has no pretensions to the title of critic here undertakes to set before the public the results of criticism as they bear on the value of the Message of Israel. The critic has his part, and no mean one, in the work of revelation. His office is destructiv; but what it destroys has hindered and disguised, not transmitted the message of the Old Testament. He sets us free to read as the contemporaries of the prophets were free to hear. He can giv no spiritual insight, can insure no harmony between the inspiration of the seer and the aspiration of the learner; but by the mere fact that he removes inconsistencies and repetitions, that he givs us the work of many instead of the work of one, he brings us nearer an appreciation which is made impossible by the endeavor to read as a single consecutiv narrativ the whole collection of a nation's legendary and mythical lore."

Of the "whole collection of a nation's legendary and mythical lore," all that the critic leaves to the Christian of to-day is the conception of the unity of God! This is "The Message of Israel," this is the essential, the permanent; all else was incidental and ephemeral. Of course it is not meant that there is nothing left of human history, nothing of ethical teaching; what is intended is that of all the alleged divine truths said to hav been revealed by God through the Old Testament, only this one is spared by the critics, only thus far dare these educated and pious men and women go in defense of the "inspiration" of the collection of ancient writings once thought by all Christians to be the very word of the Most High.

Incorporating in his comments some words, phrases, and sentences from "The Message of Israel," Professor Bruce continues:

"It will be evident from these sentences that the writer has no sympathy with the notion that an inspired book is above criticism. On the contrary, it is her deliberate conviction that no writing needs criticism so much as that which is the result of inspiration. It is necessary to distinguish between the precious and the vile, to find the Bible within the Bible. For where there is inspiration there is also 'intermission,' 'interruption,' lapse from the divine to the human. Refusal to see this, and resolute determination to treat the whole contents of the Bible as of equal importance, forming together a consistent harmonious revelation, has for its inevitable result that the pathos, the dramatic interest, the profound spiritual teaching of the Old Testament are all hidden from the eye. The highest and best book is leveled down to that which is least valuable, and the whole becomes a volume which it is our religious duty to read, and which we do read with a uniform listlessness and 'devout inattention.' How vain the attempt 'to carry on into Leviticus the reverence with which the story of Joseph had at first been heard, ending by associating that also with tedium and disgust.' How necessary, if we would really profit and enjoy, to recognize degrees of interest and value."

Except for the saving claim that something in the old book is inspired, this is an excellent Freethought argument. Rationalists hav ever argued that the attempt to prove that all the Bible—good, bad, and indifferent, true, false, and doubtful—is inspired, has made the work a curse to humanity, when it might hav been of considerable benefit if it had been accepted and studied as a human production. Many a good man has turned from the volume in disgust and horror when it was thrust upon him as the immaculate and inerrant word of a just and all-wise God. Yet he gladly would hav separated its wheat from its chaff and pursued its historical clues, had it come to him from the hand of the antiquary, accompanied with full liberty to read or leave unread, to accept or reject, as his inclination and reason might prompt. But while Miss Wedgwood's argument is in so far sound, it is to be remembered that the moment the Bible is placed on the same level with other books, to be subjected to the same canons of criticism and measured by identical ethical standards, that moment all a priori assumptions that any portions of it are inspired must, logically, be abandoned. When it is admitted that different parts of the book are of varying "degrees of interest and value;" that there are "intermissions," "interruptions," "lapses from the divine to the human," etc., it becomes a question of early impressions, of prejudice, of belief, of capacity for analysis and synthesis, or of learning whether a given portion shall be assigned a divine or a human origin. There can be no certitude for you. It cannot be proved, for instance, that the conception of the oneness of God came from outside of and above man. You are not able to get back of man in your study of documents. You may assume that the doctrin in question must hav had a supernatural source, and when asked why this must be you will reply that man, unaided, could not hav evolved the idea. How do you know that he could not? The idea is here and you hav never been able to go back of the human brain in your attempt to trace it to its birthplace. Human brains and human hands, for all that you can prove to the contrary, formulated the conception and impressed the characters expressing it upon bricks, parchment, vellum, and paper.

Professor Bruce is apparently painfully conscious that the acceptance of Miss Wedgwood's theory leaves little of the Bible as coming from God, and he sees that the diminished claim made for the book once considered infallible in all its parts and teachings must shock the rank and file of the church membership; he realizes that science and scholarship hav left little of the asserted divinity anyway, and he thinks it will be best to giv the defeat of inspiration the appearance of a treaty of peace between approximately equal powers, thus saving for a little time the ecclesiastical forces from utter rout. How both he and Miss Wedgwood reach out eager hands for the crumbs left of the once large and abounding loaves of revelation, and how they try to make "The Message of Israel" explain the chronological disorder and historical blundering of the Bible writers, are shown in the quotations which follow:

"Israel's message made clearer by criticism—such is the thesis of the work before us. What, then, is Israel's message? In general it is that unity belongs to the Eternal; in other words, that God is one, not many. A very bald message, we may be inclined to think, but the commonplaces of later generations were great originalities in earlier times, and it is the duty of a student of the religious history of mankind to endeavor by a sympathetic effort of imagination to transfer himself to the time when monotheism was a grand, startling revelation to a world accustomed to polytheism. It was Israel's honor and privilege to be the medium of this revelation. Her one God was her glory. Her own unity lay in steadfast witness throughout all her generations, and through all her representativ men, to this truth. In virtue of this witness-bearing, she was the prophet among the nations. Her long-continued prophesying, with the unity of the Eternal for her august theme, accounts at once for the grandeur of her literature, and for the strange state of confusion in which it has been transmitted to us, with an utter disregard of dates and historic order. For the eye that is fixed in the eternal is indifferent to the distinctions of time.

"'The distinction of first and last loses its importance. A history which depends for all its value on the revelation of the unseen is comparativly indifferent to chronology. A parable has no date. · · · The seer stammers when he seeks to define between is and shall be; he often blunders when he seeks to define between shall be and was. His history is a part of his prophecy. He is not conscious of fiction in explaining his vivid consciousness of a national tendency as an event in the past for which no evidence can be produced, except the very vividness of this consciousness and its resemblance to a memory.'"

Professor Bruce perceives that the lines of the legions of Christianity must be reformed; her armies must again "about face" and "move on" at the imperativ command of the genius of the age; she, the divinely commissioned teacher of "God's truth," must once more adapt herself to the enlarged intelligence of mortal man or yield up her life. The unchangeable must change or perish. Inspiration cannot successfully cope with investigation; revelations from God must assimilate the truths of the revelations of science or take their place in the museums of dead creeds and gods. The clerical reviewer says, referring to the book, "The Message of Israel":

"It will be specially helpful and suggestiv to clergymen who know something of criticism and feel the need of aid in interpreting scripture along the new lines. They cannot go on much longer dealing with the Old Testament literature in the old-fashioned way, as if nothing had happened. They must find a way of popularizing critical results, and of making the people feel that the Bible still remains a divine book."

Yes, something has happened, but the theocrats go on in the attempt to more closely unite church and state and thus assassinate liberty, as though they were wholly unconscious of the fact that many of the dogmas, claimed by them to be of God, are admitted by the most intelligent champions of Christianity to be of human origin and sanction. They are trying to vote admitted falsehoods into the constitutions and statute-books of the states and of the nation.

An Oasis in the Statutory Desert.

When Mayor Hopkins of Chicago vetoed the Sunday-closing ordinance passed by the city council he was evidently acting fully in harmony with the opinions of the higher courts of the state and was faithfully carrying out the law of that commonwealth. In his message he says:

"In most of the states all worldly labor or business is prohibited Sunday, following in that regard the British statute enacted under the reign of Charles II. But in Illinois a different rule prevails. Worldly labor and employment are prohibited only in case they disturb the peace and good order of society. This distinction has been expressly recognized by our supreme court in the following language: 'The offense by that [British] statute is the performance of labor or business; and by ours it is the disturbance of the peace and good order of society.'

"And the appellate court in construing our Sunday law declares: 'Labor Sunday is not of itself punishable under this statute nor can it be said that the statute prohibits labor Sunday. The offense that is punishable is the disturbance of the peace and good order of society.'

"It is owing to this distinction that our courts hav held that a contract made Sunday is valid and that even the operation of a reaping machine the Lord's day is not in itself punishable."

Illinois is assuredly in advance of all her sisters. Her Sunday law has in it much of the elements of common sense and justice, and it is gratifying to know that her courts hav interpreted the law so broadly, especially in affirming the validity of Sunday contracts. Such a judicial opinion slaps legalized knavery sharply in its impudent face. But it is to be regretted that her lawmakers, seeing so much more clearly than their brethren in other states, did not decline to enact any law particularly for Sunday. "The peace and good order of society" need protection equally on all days and a special statute for their defense on Sunday while they are guarded by general laws only during the rest of the week can do no good and may be productiv of much harm when administered by weak or bigoted law officers. Had Chicago possessed a fanatical mayor a scheme of inexcusable tyranny would hav been consummated. With a secular constitution and no Sunday statutes local theocrats will not be able to take snap judgment by ordinance of councils or decisions of rural Dogberrys.

Mayor Hopkins agrees with Justice Walker of the Illinois Supreme Court, who, when pasing upon the validity of Sunday contracts, said:

"Must a person be criminally punished for writing a letter to a friend Sunday, or a barber for shaving a customer, or a person for selling another a cigar, or purchasing or reading a newspaper Sunday, and for almost innumerable like acts? The statute could never hav been adopted in such a spirit and for such purposes."

Yet this is precisely what the Sunday statutes of other states permit to be done, nay, declare shall be done. None but a priest or preacher could hav first promulgated the notion that it is morally and should be made legally a crime to enter into a contract on some particular day of the week, but rascality was quick to see that here was a chance to defraud the unthinking and the confiding, and so the infamous aid to the cheater went into the statute-books.

Christianity Not Self-Sustaining.

Christianity would go down to death were it not for statute laws. It cannot stand by its own strength. Such is the candid confession of some of its representativs. Pleading for the preparation of Sabbath observance books for use in the common schools, the Christian Reformer brings a paragraph to a climax with this sentence:

"If the Christian Sabbath goes, Christianity goes with it."

We cease to wonder that Christian propagandists, who are all honorable gentlemen, could send to Congress tens of millions of forged signatures in favor of closing the World's Fair on Sunday, when we realize how much they think depends upon the enactment and enforcement of Sunday laws. For it must be understood that the Reformer and its congeners mean that Christianity will go when Christians lose their power to enforce Sunday observance by statute law. They do not mean that Christianity depends upon the respect and obedience which individual Christians render to the Sabbath law of the Bible or the Sunday law of the modern Christian church. They are much more solicitous to compel dissenters to conform through fear of fines and imprisonment imposed by earthly courts than they are to induce church members to liv up to their professions through fear of hell or love of God. To be sure, they scold recalcitrant Christians for their disregard of strict Sunday observance, but they also take particular pains to make such neglect the pretext or justification for still more rigid Sunday laws, and they insist that the nation is going to perdition at express train speed because there are not many more and better enforced Sunday enactments. Whatever happens in the community that in their estimation is an evil, they at once attribute to "Sabbath desecration." They are determined that the Sunday of Constantine shall receive the outward respect of every inhabitant of the country, no matter whether he really respects it or not, and regardless of the wrongs they inflict upon those who hav precisely the same right to work or play on that day that they hav to spend it in pious meditation and church attendance. Wholly disregardful of the only Sabbath for which there is any sanction in the Bible, which they claim is the word of God, they are rancorously eager to send to prison, and believe that God will send to hell, whoever does not make himself the slave of the holy day which was set apart from secular uses by the first Christian emperor of Rome, the cruel and murderous Constantine.

So mad hav they become that they now declare that the whole superstructure of Christianity will tumble into ruin if the entire population of the republic—Christians, Freethinkers, Jews, Pagans, and the unclassified—are not forced by human law to grovel in the dust at the feet of the priesthood on a day of sanctified idleness, a day of which, as such, the reputed founder of Christianity never heard. So far as the alleged sacred record tells us, Jesus never said that his gospel would fail unless through all the coming ages the external observance of the "Christian Sabbath" was enforced by civil law. On the contrary, he intimated that of more importance even than obedience to the fundamental laws of society—among which he did not include the law of the Sabbath—was generosity to the poor. He told the ruler who came before him to "keep the commandments" if he would "enter into life." The man wanted to know which of the commandments he meant, and Jesus answered: "Thou shalt do no murder, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Honor thy father and thy mother, and Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Not a word about Sabbath "rest," Jewish or Christian. The young man said he had obeyed these laws from his youth up. To which Jesus responded, according to Matthew, "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell what thou hast and giv to the poor." According to Mark he said, "One thing thou lackest," etc. Still not a syllable about the Sabbath idol, which Jesus' Covenanter followers say is the keystone of the arch of Christianity.

Paul did not think that Christianity was going to eternal smash unless the consciences of all men who might not willingly observe a certain holy day should be outraged by the minions of the state acting as the servants of an intolerant church. On the contrary, he emphatically declared that "one man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." Nothing in that about the "persuasion" that resides in policemen's clubs and warrants of commitment. In another epistle Paul said with, if possible, even sharper distinctness: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days." Affirmativly, Paul often laid great stress on the necessity of charity, which he in one place avers is the end of the commandment. This is frequently interpreted to mean love. Base ball players fined at Pittsburg and barbers in Kansas City; Adventists in jails in Tennessee and Maryland and in chain gangs in Arkansas, find great difficulty in discovering either charity or love in Christian Sunday laws.

It is evident that James was unacquainted with the theocratic notion that Christianity is dependent for its existence upon the enactment and enforcement of invasiv and cruel Sunday statutes. He thought that religion was a matter of individual choice and conduct, not of law, for he said that "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." The political Christians of all ages—and this class has made the history of the church and written it in blood with the pen of Fear upon the heart and brain of the race—had and hav precious little use for James's definition. It is much easier to pass laws to compel people to pretend to agree with you or punish them if they do not make the hypocritical profession, than it is to mind your own business and set the example of good lives to those whose brains are so constructed that they cannot look at everything through the same mental eyes that you do.

The Christian Reformer has much to say about our opposition to the schemes of the theocrats and it warns more liberal or indifferent Christians who do not join with the National Reformers in the effort to Christianize the Constitution that they are making common cause with the Infidels. This, it is supposed, will frighten some of the more timid progressiv Christians into the ranks of the reactionists, for it is recalled that the Bible states that Jesus declared that "he that is not with me is against me." This saying has in times past done much to keep the ranks of the churches' adherents closed, and it is fondly hoped that it will be not less effectiv in this crisis, which threatens, through the defeat of the Sunday-law crusade, to overwhelm Christianity itself, as we are informed by the Sundayites. Now we respectfully submit that the nontheocratic Christians are much nearer to Jesus in their opposition to enforced Sabbath observance than the theocrats are in their advocacy thereof, and we ask Dr. McAllister and his associate editors of the Christian Reformer if they hav the courage and manliness to lay before their readers the before-quoted utterances of Jesus, Paul, and James and attempt to reconcile their letter and spirit with the Sunday despotism which they, as latter-day Christian editors and ministers, champion in their papers and pulpits, on the platform and in the committee rooms of Congress, constitutional conventions, and state legislatures. Will they do it?

On page 494 of this issue will be found a list of "Scientific Books Cheap." They are all valuable and standard works, and you may find among them the very books you want.

A twelve-page protest against the Sunday bills offered in Congress by Kyle, Johnson, Gallinger, and Morse will be sent for five cents. Twenty-five copies, three cents each; one hundred copies, $2.

A theocrat asks why a Protestant nation should provide both Protestant and Catholic schools. There is no reason, of course, but the United States is not a Protestant nation. Protestantism is not the recognized state religion, for there is no recognized state religion. Our schools are, or should be, common, not Protestant schools.

A correspondent of the Christian Advocate states that the Moody meetings in Washington converted about two hundred persons at a cost of over four thousand dollars. But it was cheaply done; only twenty dollars per "soul." At that rate the money the churches save each year by the exemption of their property from taxation would bring at least eight hundred thousand perishing sinners into the fold of righteousness.

An insect has been discovered in Japan which feeds on the caterpillar, so injurious to fruit and other trees. "It catches the caterpillars and holds them firmly with its strong arms while it sucks the juices out of them." The Oregon Horticultural Society has made some successful experiments with this insect. "It is called the 'praying mantis,' from the devotional attitude it assumes while watching its prey." So says the Daily America. We hav about one hundred and twelve thousand "praying mantis" in this country, but instead of sucking the life juices cut of humanity's enemies they confine their delicate but effectiv attention almost entirely to man himself. One of their neat tricks, performed in a very "devotional attitude," is to induce the foolish people to exempt their, the praying mantis', property from taxation. Some of the more audacious and greedy of these pious insects are now at work on a scheme to hav their most dangerous doctrins taught in a series of special text books to be prepared for use in the common schools. Cannot Japan furnish us with a parasite that will suck the juices out of these praying mantis of the pulpit?

All members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week write to the Attorney-General of the United States, Richard Olney, Washington, D. C., in regard to the prosecution of J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas, indicted for sending through the mails a postal card upon which was written a passage from the Bible. Ask him to investigate the case and hav it dropped. Call his attention to the opinion given by Assistant Attorney-General James N. Tyner in his letter to the postmaster of Cedar Falls, Iowa, the letter bearing date of April 10, 1891, and also to a similar opinion given by the same official to the postmaster of Denison, Texas. This letter was dated April 24, 1891. Mr. Tyner held that the Bible did not come under the condemnation of the Comstock postal statutes, and that a publication made up wholly of extracts from the Bible could not be denied transmission in the mails. This surely covers the case of Mr. Wise. If you wish to quote from these decisions of Assistant Attorney-General Tyner, refer to THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7, 1894, where they are printed in full. Make a strong, courteously-worded statement.

Rev. H. D. Jenkins, D. D., of Sioux City, Iowa, writing in the Presbyterian Independent, refers to the American Railway Union, and says that that organization denied membership to his friend and fellow-soldier, the colored sexton of his church. The man had served bravely under Farragut in Mobile Bay. After his rejection he laid "his little bunch of flowers, from the garden of his cabin," upon the communion table of Dr. Jenkins, indicating "that as between the imported lords of labor lodges in this country, and the church, he had found the laboring man's friend and his friend beside the altar of the church of Christ." The comparison in this single instance is certainly favorable to Dr. Jenkins and his church and against the railway organization, but it is proverbial that one swallow does not make the summer. We call the attention of the Independent and of its correspondent to the fact that the Southern Presbyterian church refuses all overtures for union with the Northern church because it fears that such union would necessitate the church association of white and colored Presbyterians. Although white Presbyterians say that they expect to share a future heaven with Negro Presbyterians they positivly refuse to sit in the same churches with them on earth. We notice that this identical prejudice is manifested and that the same divisions exist in other Christian bodies. So long as those who claim to be the heaven-sent teachers of the gospel of "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man" set no better example, what can we expect of uninspired and undelegated labor unions and cycling associations?

The Christian Reformer is strangely misinformed concerning the Sunday ordinance vetoed by Mayor Hopkins of Chicago. In his message Mr. Hopkins stigmatized the act as class legislation, whereupon the Reformer observes:

> "If a Sabbath-closing ordinance is class legislation, we would like to know what kind of laws would not fall under the same condemnation? The opponents of any law on our statute-books could make the same plea with just as much reason."

This is preposterous. Does not Dr. McAllister know that the act which Mayor Hopkins vetoed was framed to close only a very few classes of business houses? It did not touch the manufactories, the drug stores, the churches, the street cars, the railroads, and scores of other industries. This was the reason that Mayor Hopkins said that it was class legislation. Again, the ordinance was vetoed because it was in conflict with the Sunday law of Illinois and the decisions of the state Supreme Court, not merely because it was class legislation, although that also was cited as one of the objections to it. The Illinois law does not forbid work on Sunday, but only the disturbance of peace and good order. Once more: Does Dr. McAllister think that anyone could object with good reason that laws against murder, theft, arson, etc., etc., are class legislation? What classes of citizens are discriminated against by those laws? What classes are exempted? As a matter of fact, Sunday statutes differ fundamentally from laws of the kind we hav named. All Sunday laws and ordinances are class legislation, for all allow some kinds of business to be conducted on Sunday. Where, for instance, is the Sunday law which punishes the preacher and church organist for pursuing their vocations on the first day of the week?

Do We Need a Deity?

I see that THE TRUTH SEEKER has been granted permission by Miss Chapman to "batter the little tin god of orthodoxy to the end of the chapter," provided only that you will deal tenderly with her particular god.

Now when I recall the philosophy of Ingersoll, that men create their own gods, I am inclined to concede the ownership of every god in fee simple to its creator, provided always that the god is to be kept strictly upon its owner's territory, and not allowed to forage upon the neighboring premises. But whether a god can be kept within bounds depends upon the sort of god it is. And "there's the rub."

This god is introduced to the Truth Seeker family as a Freethinker's god, but comes adorned with all the toggery of the orthodox article; has the same impossible attributes, infinit power, unerring wisdom, and mighty salvation, and has the same irrepressible power to subdue all things to himself.

And Miss Chapman, like all other possessors of omnipotent gods, quietly proceeds to remove all obstructions to his omnipotence, gravely urging that her god is much more real than the physical universe; that there are, in fact, some grounds for the notion that the physical universe does not exist at all, as an objectiv reality. In short, that there is nothing in the universe at all but her god (and, perhaps, spirit).

Now this is where my objection comes in. I am perfectly willing Miss Chapman shall deny her own personal existence (as she well-nigh does) rather than imperil the existence of her god. That is all right, for it is her own affair. But when any god crowds the whole physical universe out of existence to make room for himself, I insist that he is altogether too infinit. He has outgrown his usefulness, and become a mere extravaganza. I can't afford to take my godliness in such huge doses.

Does Miss Chapman realize how she came by these extravagant notions of an infinit deity? Does she understand that ideas are creatures of growth, most of them developed from germs as unlike themselvs as the acorn is unlike the oak?

We all know (or ought to know) that in primitiv times there were no infinit gods. Infinity had not dawned upon the human intellect. The old-time gods were the various natural objects and processes: sun, moon, earth, fire, water, wind, storm, etc.—all of them finite, as Miss Chapman has said all nature is. Each god had his strange, fantastic attributes, but there was none with infinit power, wisdom, or love. The great glittering vault of the heavens, encircling the whole world, was the most high God, the eternal presence, within whom all things liv and move and hav their being. Being a complete hollow sphere, it was, of course, without parts, without parallax or shadow of turning, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

You could not say this of any of the other gods. And this was the ancient Ziu (or sky), the dyaus, deus, or deity of Miss Chapman; infinit and endless in the sense of an endless chain—well represented by the ancient Egyptian symbol—a circle—now translated eternity or infinity.

These attributes hav been constantly applied to the dyaus, while down through the ages the great drift of word-meaning has borne their import far from their ancient signification, and the very dyaus himself has drifted with his environment entirely out of sight, into a realm of pure ideality, the only place where he could possibly fill the extravagant proportions of his modern attributes. Besides, we hav made him doubly miserable by heaping upon him most of the ill-fitting adjectivs once adorning the other gods.

In this and other similar ways hav all our absurd religious ideas come into existence. They thrive upon our vague definitions. They are the legitimate fruit of loose methods of thought.

Infinit love, eternal verity, perfect wisdom, spirit of the universe, what are they when tried in the crucible of modern thought?

To illustrate: In conversation with a genial yet orthodox minister, the Rev. A. D. Finch, once the Iowa state evangelist for the Christian denomination, I said: "In my search through this vast universe, I am unable to find any room for a deity unless it be the spirit of nature (of the universe)," to which the good minister gave his unqualified assent, saying he too had arrived at the same thought. Now here are three of us, the orthodox believer, Miss Chapman, and myself, all defining their deity in precisely the same terms. Their vagueness becomes apparent when the second taunts the first with a little tin god, and the third with peril to the whole cause of humanity.

It might be profitable for Miss Chapman to explain how the spirit of nature can possess attributes not inherent in nature itself—how it can be above and beyond nature, and she might try to explain precisely what she really sees that the Atheist or Agnostic does not see, when she looks up into the heavens and sees his name there, etc.

And if Miss Chapman will reflect that modern science has thoroughly established the fact that ideas grow up through the ages, and are born into us with a grim persistence like bones and muscles, always more or less modified by the environment (teaching, etc.); that they constitute our sole intellectual individuality, our personality—bearing this in mind, Miss Chapman may profit by the knowledge that modern thinkers will understand exactly the divine presence with which she is suddenly brought face to face when she turns to the innermost chambers of her soul and finds them full of the god idea. She has only unveiled her lineage and environment, her personality, her very self. Nothing else can possibly be there, for no idea ever penetrates the human brain from any other source. It may be no mistake to call it my Lord and my God, but to clothe it with infinit perfection and wisdom that never errs is (in my estimation) to fall into the one human weakness which, above every other folly, has baptized the world in anguish and despair—viz., to mistake human ignorance for divine wisdom.

This brings us to the most vital consideration in this whole controversy—viz., the ethical question propounded by Miss Chapman herself near the close of the November article: "How will it injure mankind to look up through the fog of their own folly to an infinit wisdom that never errs · · · and to link their feeble efforts with an infinit power · · · able to subdue all things to itself?"

How will it injure mankind? Aye, verily! Let the pages of human history furnish the overwhelming reply.

Very naturally that wisdom which never errs has always and everywhere furnished creeds for human thought, while infinit power has covered the earth with costly churches, and divine guidance has led the world into the snare of priestcraft and pretension.

It is the identical power that controls all the colleges, ordains armies of preachers and priests, robs the people of uncounted millions, creates cardinals and crowns popes.

It requires a bull-dog at every school-house door to keep away its divine presence, and the strong arm of the secular law cannot always prevent it from imprisoning Adventists in Tennessee, driving a whole race from their homes in Russia, and dispersing the world's great Congress of Freethinkers from Madrid, not to mention a hundred lesser evils, such as confiscating heretical bequests all over England, and closing the world's great fair one-seventh of its time to conserve its omnipotent interest.

It deludes very good people into the monstrous notion that all the world (except themselvs) are staggering under awful loads of original sin and ineradicable cussedness, as it is now deluding Miss Chapman and the great mass of its votaries.

And having betrayed the people into the disastrous error that primitiv ignorance is original sin, it proceeds to nail fast the door of their intellectual dungeon with the terrible falsehood that the surest cure for original ignorance is not so much a liberal education as baptism into the holy ghost, and unerring wisdom always has a snap link for instantaneous connection.

To-day its whole mighty energy is expended all over the earth in the one task of decoying ignorant men and frail women into its snare, and to this end it employs the most gigantic enginry and the most fox-like cunning; and it baits its trap with the most tempting illusions—infinit wisdom, mighty salvation, and never-ending life; and it throws in a robe of respectability and the title of the very elect.

The result is everywhere the same, viz, to exalt primitiv ignorance into infinit arrogance.

It always fires the human heart with a spirit of conquest, everywhere adorning its banners with the same despotic legend, "He is able to subdue all things to himself," and no thought of equality can possibly consort with its retinue of kings, and lords, and masters, and gods. The final result is summed up by Miss Chapman: "A universe without a sovereign ruler is an unthinkable impossibility" (to any one badly linked with infinit wisdom). Of course, it is much easier to think of a universe without an objectiv existence.

It is true that by linking our feeble efforts with infinit wisdom we easily accomplish some things wholly inaccessible to unaided human persuasivness. I hav known the few dollars so carefully saved by a dutiful father to buy boots for his barefooted boy in the dead of a Northern winter—all the money he had in the world—to be easily transferred to the pocket of the stylish preacher, while the bare feet and quivering lips of the boy and the unavailing tears of the father as they fell upon the precious coins bore competent testimony to its ample power to subdue all things unto itself.

It can suborn witnesses to testify falsely for its sake, as Paul and most of the early Christian fathers did. It can bribe judges and legislators to disregard their oaths and trample their country's laws under their feet with easy impunity. Blackstone says: "A judge is sworn to decide according to the laws of his country, even though contrary to his own private opinion. But there are exceptions, as when such a verdict · · · clearly contravenes the divine law." In this latter case he may turn traitor, hypocrit, and perjurer, and all because of this pitiful linking with some sort of supposed unerring wisdom.

The unspeakable injury which humanity has suffered and is yet suffering from this source is conspicuous on every page of human history. Nor do I think it is overlooked even by Miss Chapman, who admits that the most abhorrent tyranny has always been ecclesiastical tyranny—that deriving its authority from unerring wisdom.

It is, without doubt, the most dangerous way that human feet can follow, full of yawning chasms and lined with cruel snares, and all its guideboards point a hundred ways, so that the traveler in this perilous way is almost certain, sooner or later, to go astray.

It not only deludes men into every possible absurdity, but prepares their minds for every form of foolishness and folly. It is certainly the father of bigotry and mother of credulity, and its companions are folly, poverty, and wrong.

In response to unerring wisdom man has committed every conceivable abomination and lent his energy to every conceivable crookedness.

"Divine guidance" has induced fathers to slay their sons, burn their wives, and giv away their daughters, and caused millions of hapless babies to be drowned in sacred rivers, burned in sacred fires, and slain in holy sacrifice; and yet every actor in all this miserable business has been just as sure of his connecting link as A. Augusta Chapman is of hers.

Men hav not stopped with the erection of prisons for heretics, but, when "linked to unerring guidance," they hav cheerfully incarcerated themselvs in cloisters, prisons, and dungeons. Not only hav they torn the flesh of supposed enemies of God, but they hav followed this wretched guide cheerfully into self-torture, mutilation, and suicide. Not only induced to burn others, but hav been led into such utter delusion as to cheerfully burn themselvs at the stake.

It has despoiled the whole earth of beauty and gladness, to mannfacture harps and crowns for impossible angels in an impossible heaven. Nay, more, it created yawning hells and conjured up legions of devils to do its wicked work.

I know Miss Chapman has said that "without God and eternal life this world is all a dreary muddle." But Miss Chapman is not the proper person to offer such information. I would prefer to hear it from the many among us who hav the adequate experience to know whereof they speak; from the Ingersolls, the Rowleys, the Putnams, etc., to whom there is no God, nor any eternal life. But, alas for Miss Chapman's philosophy! all these are unanimous in their opposit testimony that earth is a lovely paradise when relieved of its incubus of faith and fear.

Will Miss Chapman undertake to inform us how it will imperil the cause of humanity to even question the existence of a deity or of eternal life? Will it impoverish the soil, bankrupt the finances, poison the mother's love, or disturb the happy dreams of the dimpled cherub at her feet? Is the cause of humanity identical with the cause of the church, the clergy, and the pope? I concede that it might disturb the prayer-meeting, dethrone the pope, and disinherit the clergy. It might shock the angels, kill the devil, and bankrupt the Holy Ghost. But how about humanity? Has Miss Chapman never yet discovered that man will ever hav his ideals, his angels of purity, and paradise of gladness, without reference to God, eternal life, or any other freak of faith or fiction? Surely they come not from without, but bud and bloom within the heart itself, the simple image of earthly hope and flower of human expectation. Part of humanity itself, destined to be forever among the children of men, even though God and eternal life should fade away into the buried ashes of a dead hope.

Miss Chapman has in none of her articles even mentioned the vital thought that underlies the whole secular philosophy, and I therefore infer she is yet a stranger to its deeper meaning, and so excusable for repelling it. She may not know that we gladly brush away the shadowy forms of far-off hopes, only to bring the heart's ideals into living contrast with the earthly life.

It may be a new philosophy and perchance a glad surprise to Miss Chapman, when she realizes that when the whole panoply of the Christian heaven is swept from the arena of human thought, its galaxy of glory simply falls richly over the face of the earth, and not a jewel is lost to human hearts. And so in the very name of precious humanity itself we urge upon Miss Chapman and others never to forget that every angel driven from paradise above reappears in the homes of men, and every flower plucked from the sweet fields of Eden blooms ever brighter in richer soil below. Nature vs. Gods.

The untutored Indian feels his dependence on the glorious sun, and to him that orb is the Great Spirit. The ancients—we know not how many thousands or millions of years ago—worshiped the sun, knowing or believing rightly that in its benign power they lived and moved and had their being. And what more natural or reasonable? All warmth, all vegetation, all life, traced to its influence. When at the autumnal equinox they saw the light of the world gradually receding, the earth growing colder and darker—suggesting the thought that possibly it might go away forever and leave the earth and them in eternal night and death—as both praise and prayer they built sacred fires on their altars and kept them burning. And when on the first evidences of the sun's return, assuring the world again of life and plenty, universal festivals were held in its honor. How beautiful this nature worship! Our Christmas is a perverted survival of it.

The manifestation of the sun-god is visible to all, and its benefits impartially bestowed. With this god, therefore, there is small room for priestcraft. But in process of time designing or crazy men declared that in dreams and visions they saw or heard a monster-god that commissioned them to set up altars and command the people to obey them. They gradually changed the term and sense of sun-god, first to Sun of God, then to Son of God, thereby necessitating a Father God; and hence the anthropomorphic God derived from dreams and visions. At different times and places the dream-god or gods differ in character; but they all giv chance for priestly hocus-pocus, senseless theology, and call for much sacrifice and revenue.

To proclaim a god and play its priest is a notable method of getting a fat living without toil. The priest succeeds in making most folks fear the god and credit it with all their woes. All such gods are bad, but some are worse than others. Our Bible God is the worst. He is a personification of cruelty, with no redeeming trait. He brings upon his own creatures slaughterings, drownings, burnings, famins, pestilences, slavery, and then "laughs at their calamities." This god is supposed to be altogether supernatural—outside the world of nature; a creator so purely good that the sight of his creatures enjoying themselvs kindles his wrath. In trying to pacify this God man has always made matters worse. The devotees may continue to pray and sacrifice and slaughter one another, but the God is still seen only in dreams and visions. He is not seen riding the whirlwind that demolishes their own altar.

When we come to think of it, the natural world is a field about large enough for the biggest kind of a man to cultivate thoroughly; and the returns are better when he confines himself to it. From gods come never our weal or our woe, from realms of nature all blessings flow.

Nature, along with its many rough features, presents an unlimited field for delightful study and activity. There is nothing supernatural in the work of converting marsh and woodland into luxurious farms for happy homes, nor in changing the roughness of Manhattan island into grand streets and beautiful parks. There is nothing supernatural in all the splendid evidences of human genius and progress displayed at our World's Fair. There is no supernaturalness in music, or in other arts and sciences that afford us so much enjoyment.

Man's greatest drawback to making the best use of the things of nature is his belief in some fearful supernatural God, who may devour him any minute. And he knows most of this king of kings who knows the least of natural things.

"But weak, finite man," saith the priest, "cannot create anything—not even a blade of grass" Well, Sir Oracle, does even the pious farmer, when cutting a heavier yield of grass in a field which had been extra-well manured, think there is any supernaturalism in it? Does he attribute his superior potato crop to supernatural agency? or, when blight and bugs injure it, does he think that his God is doing the mischief? When lightning strikes and sets on fire his barn, does he fancy his savior playing the incendiary? He may, on Sundays, flatter himself that he is a believer in an overruling providence, but during the rest of the week he doesn't believe a word of it. He sets the trap to catch the skunk that misbehaves, and, at nightfall, he bars the door 'gainst Christian knaves.

Nature is not altogether unkind. It givs us the universal law that, while in health, we do not realize the event of death. This merciful law enables us to liv as if we were never to die; to go about the business of life cheerfully, borrowing no trouble about another world. It enables even the average Christian in five minutes to forget a terrorizing sermon, and sit down to a good Sunday dinner with as much relish as if he had never heard of a hell.

Yet the priest makes it his Christian business continually to remind us that life is short; that we may die within the year—perhaps before another sunrise! His croaking does not disturb the strong man, however; but he does succeed in fixing a banner inscribed, "Death, Judgment, Prepare to meet thy God," as a frontlet before the mind of each weak, timid believer, that casts a perpetual shadow on the pleasures of life. He thinks to placate his God by slandering nature. If there is such a thing as blasphemy, he is the blasphemer.

The same merciful law of nature operates inversely in sickness. As sickness increases, the appetite for the enjoyments of life decreases. There is no pleasure in a table of luxuries when taste and smell are gone. Music givs no joy when the ear ceases its function. As the senses become weak and dim, resignation naturally follows; and then calm peace molds and fixes the last expression of the dying one. There has been no thought of meeting an angry God. It is only when the priest enters the sick-room with his book of spiritual nostrums that the sick one is alarmed. The priest solemnly approaches the patient and, in sepulchral tones, asks the weak mortal, whose vision is already indistinct, if he can see Jesus—if he is prepared to meet his God—as though he is expected, immediately on drawing his last breath, to engage in a wrestling match with a God almighty.

The priest may get the dying one to repeat, in whispers, the stereotyped words, "O Lord, hav mercy on me, miserable sinner!" But the excitement proves too much—the fever increases, and there is a corpse on the morrow. Then it is proclaimed, with a flourish of lies, that Smith, who had not been near a church in twenty years, died peacefully in the arms of Jesus.

The priest by his conjuring cannot prolong life; he may shorten it. His presence in the sick-room only excites the weak, fevered brain of the patient, and is positiv cruelty. With no priest there is no hell. L. G. Reed.

Taxation of Churches.

The New York Constitutional Convention has of late had this important question, among others, before it. The total value of church property in the state, it seems, according to published statistics, is $140,123,008, taking the figures from the census of 1890. The same census, which of course is the latest, places the total value of church property in the United States at $679,694,439.

The former saying of President Garfield is cited by those who believe that church property should be taxed, viz.: "If you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a tax upon the whole community." But the exemptionists argue that church property is non-productiv, and for that reason should be exempt. In reply, the non-exemptionists say that a great deal of secular property is likewise non-productiv; and they add: "But, as a matter of fact, are churches wholly unproductiv? In many of them pews are rented at prices which put them out of the reach of all but the more wealthy people of the society, making these churches practically club-rooms for the rich. Why should they not pay taxes on these luxurious apartments of worship? People who own club-rooms, in which they worship, probably, just as sincerely on week days, as they and others do in the fashionable churches on Sunday, must pay taxes on their places of resort; and there is really no sound reason why owners of the churches should hav more favors than they."

"In another way," they argue, "the churches are productiv. They are collection offices and workshops. In them are gathered most of the moneys which pay the salaries of one hundred and twelve thousand or more clergymen, and in them these clergymen do much of the work which entitles them to the pay. In the buildings owned by these corporations millions of dollars are annually raised by means of pew-rentals, fairs, raffles, meals, collections, and subscriptions. How can they be exempt on the ground of non-productivity?" But, again, the exemptionists claim that churches should not be taxed because they exert a great moral influence. The non-exemptionists reply: "Perhaps no other 'argument' against justice in taxation has so much influence on the average man as this, and yet no defense of church pauperism could be weaker. What can be said for the moral influence of an organization which deliberately refuses to pay its just dues? Fundamental to all morality is justice. The man who will not deal justly with his fellows is not moral in any practical way. He may cry aloud for morality, and decency, and purity until he is exhausted, but if he systematically defrauds his neighbors or denies to them equality of opportunity, he is dishonest. It is a hollow mockery to claim that the church is a healthful moral influence, while she each year puts her hands into the pockets of the people and gets millions of dollars. She owns the property, and she should pay the taxes upon it at the same rate that the individual citizen is assessed for his property."

Then it is contended, too, than a fine and costly church enhances the value of the adjacent property, and for that reason it is just to exempt it from taxation. The non-exemptionists here quote from Rev. Dr. Wayland's "Political Economy" as follows: "All that religious societies hav a right to ask of the civil government is the same privileges for transacting their own affairs which societies of every sort possess. This they hav a right to demand, not because they are religious societies, but because the exercise of religion is an innocent mode of pursuing happiness. If it happens accidentally that others are benefited, it does not follow that they are obliged to pay for this benefit. It cannot be proved that the Christian religion needs the support of the civil government, since it has existed and flourished when entirely deprived of this support." Dr. Franklin once said: "When a religion is good I conceive that it will support itself; and when it cannot support itself, and God does not take care to support it, so its professors are obliged to call for help from the civil power, it is a sign, I apprehend, of its being a bad one." And again President Garfield said: "The divorce between church and state ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere, in any state or in any nation, should be exempt from equal taxation."—Banner of Light.

A Peculiar View of Church and State.

In the Forum for June the Rev. J. M. Farley, Catholic priest, and vicar-general of the diocese of New York, givs expression to a peculiar view of what constitutes a union of church and state. Strange as it may appear, the same idea is held by Protestants, even by the most radical National Reformers. Here it is:

> The union of church and state is a bugbear in America, for the simple reason that not one in a thousand knows its meaning. When the state formally names a church the church of the community ruled by the state, builds and supports its churches, schools, and charities, pays salaries to the clergy, treats with the church authorities as to duties and privileges, and has a voice in the appointment of church officials, then you hav a union of church and state. Such a union exists under very few governments to-day, and where it does, as a rule, the results are often unsatisfactory to the churches.

Of course the rival churches in America do not want to see one church at the head. They therefore use this kind of logic. Union of church and state is when one church receives all benefits of state patronage. We do not desire this, because we want all churches to be recognized! When one particular church receives governmental support, it is union of church and state; when all churches place their nimble fingers in the government till, it is not such union. If but one rascal in a community is addicted to stealing, it is theft and should be severely panished; but if all the rascals in the community steal, it is not theft and should not be so designated!

They do not consider that if Christianity is made the state religion, it will only be a question of time before the most powerful church will be in the ascendancy. They are quarreling now because the Catholics hav received more money for Indian schools than the Protestants. If some of our religious politicians should be successful in their measures they will begin their quarreling in earnest, because then the spoils will be greater.

News and Notes.

Sidnaw is a small place in the great lumber region of Northern Michigan. The forests stretch about it in seemingly endless desolation and grandeur; and it looks as if you were out of the world. The hamlet contains about three hundred inhabitants. It is a new town, and has all the aspects rude and motley of a frontier settlement. There are some fine blocks and pretty houses, shanties with one or two rooms, tents, stumps, etc. It is five years old, and up to date there is no church built or minister resident here. It was quite refreshing to find such a gem of civilization in the midst of this mighty wilderness. The people here are quite intelligent and progressiv, too much so for the clergy to find an abiding-place. Generally where there are half a dozen houses the priest is on hand to draw his rations, and take what fat of the land there is. Sidnaw so far is fortunate. I do not know how long it will escape the plague.

There was quite a fire here after the arrangements had been made for the lectures, sweeping away about half the town, I should judge. Among the buildings destroyed was the Maccabees' Hall, where I expected to hold forth. The blackened ruins made it look at first as if the Freethought campaign must be postponed, but Isadore Goulette, our pioneer captain at this post, is one of those who never giv up, and he determined to hav the course of lectures even if they were given out of doors beneath the arches of the boundless forest. The only place to be secured was the schoolhouse, and the use of it was kindly granted for the occasion. I gave six lectures. The schoolhouse was well filled every evening with an equal number of ladies and gentlemen. So it seems that the brain of woman is fully as large and emancipated as that of man in this country where the ax and gun are still combating the almost unbroken ranks of primeval nature. These were the first Freethought lectures in this community, and they created quite an agitation. Nowhere hav I found more quiet or attentiv audiences, although many of them were Christians and had never listened to the like before. It is evident that for this community a radical and far-reaching movement has been started.

Isadore Goulette and Isadore Caron are our leaders at this point. They meant to hav the lectures even if they paid the entire expenses themselvs; and they did pay the major part of them. They are enthusiastic readers and supporters of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for this reason are ready to do their level best for the Liberal cause. They were both baptized into the Catholic church, and hav had many varied and interesting experiences. They were born in Canada, in an almost exclusivly orthodox community, and hav had to work their own way to liberty and to science. They hav learned by practical experience, and received their education in the struggle of existence and the battle of ideas. They certainly, still in the flush of youth, hav a bright career before them in the work for humanity and progress. Dr. Wm. McBirney is also a splendid comrade in this campaign. He recognizes the demands of science, and is not afraid to say what he thinks even if he is in professional life.

Mr. Ray D. Curtis is another advanced Freethinker, thoroughly up with the times and without a particle of superstition, although he inclines to the spiritualistic philosophy of the universe. Mrs. Ray D. Curtis, Mrs. Isadore Goulette, and other ladies I find deeply interested in Freethought. In fact, for its size, this is one of the best Freethinking communities I hav labored in. I visited the mill, which turns out about seventy thousand feet of lumber per day. At present it is running day and night. There is also a planing mill here. Timber claims are quite valuable in the vicinity. Some hav been sold for as high as $18,000. But little farming has been done. It is a good place for strawberries and potatoes. Scarcely anything else has been raised so far. Very little land has been cleared of the forest.

I visited Goulette's cabin in the woods, which reminds me of Ingersoll's description of the pioneer's home. Mr. Goulette has taken up a claim and intends to liv the free and independent life of a farmer. The next time I come here I expect to find a welcome in his forest homestead, where he will make the oxen plow and the ax ring. There is excellent hunting and fishing about here, and I could hav had plenty of fun in that direction under the expert guidance of Isadore Caron if I had been versed in these arts. Those who like these things could not find a better companion than my friend. I hope I hav not seen the last of Sidnaw or its genial comradeship. I was pleased also to meet H. W. James, a reformer and Freethinker of many years, and whose name is enrolled with the TRUTH SEEKER corps.

I left it in the middle of the night, Monday, July 23d, and my birthday. But birthdays do not count with me any more. I no longer keep track of time. The best way is to keep young, whatever happens.

I travel through vast regions of wooded land. Now and then a village gleams upon the sight. I arrive this morning at Sault Ste. Marie, at 10 o'clock, nine hours' ride from Sidnaw. I remain here over night, and to-morrow go to Drummond by boat, seventy miles. I anticipate a delightful voyage.

"Soo," as this place is called, is a very pretty summer residence. The water prospects about it are beautiful. It is a lively town. The weather is cool. The traveling public seem to find it a pleasant location. The boats ply in all directions. Over across I can see the Canadian shores.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Observations.

The political suicide of Henry George is announced. At a recent mass-meeting held in this city for the purpose of expressing sympathy with the railroad strikers, Mr. George made a speech in which he said that "the right of laborers to work for whatever wages they choose must be protected." The audience hissed him, and a few days later, after due deliberation, the Socialistic labor unions decided that he wouldn't do. I would remark that it was a noble sacrifice on the part of Mr. George, and that such sentiments as he expresses, if rigidly adhered to, would not only do away with violence in times of labor troubles, but would also keep many a misguided striker out of the penitentiary.

After a long time between drinks, the governor of South Carolina has reopened his dispensaries. It is claimed that the state saloons furnish a better article of liquor for the price than private enterprises of the same class, but that claim has still to be substantiated. Having no license to pay for and no expense for police protection they can surely afford to do a square business. The objection to state institutions of this kind is that they ignore the fraternal principle of liv and let liv. They hav a monopoly of the trade, so that in the absence of competition it will never be learned whether the state system is the best or not. In order to demonstrate the superiority of the dispensary, it will hav to be run alongside the private saloon. Let the state be a gentleman and accord to individuals the rights which it claims for itself. Giv the other fellows an equal chance. If the state dispensary is the best, it will survive and competitors will go out of business. If it is not the best, there is no reason why it should exist. The question of public or private ownership of other large industries might possibly be settled in the same way, which is a fair one.

Col. W. H. Burr, of Washington, D. C, writes:

For quoting Isaiah xxxvi, 12, on a postal card and sending it to a parson the sender has been imprisoned and is to be tried for obscenity. I once read that passage aloud as it came to my turn in the course of devotional exercise—reading and praying—at my brother's house. Three females were present, but I didn't shirk duty.

Why not now print it on thousands of postal cards and giv it a wide circulation?

Such experiences are embarrassing, nevertheless. I once had to read Romans iv, 19, in school. The teacher was a married lady without children, and her name was Sarah, too. It was this which first led me to inquire why such a book as the Bible should be read in the schools of our land. The climax of this sort of thing has been capped by the Rev. Samuel Earngey, of Elgin, Ill., who, on a $50 wager, read the whole of Numbers xxxi to his congregation. The chapter, though inspired, is quite offensiv to good taste and smell.

Anyone anxious to go to jail might adopt Mr. Burr's suggestion, and print Isaiah's impurity on postal cards for general circulation, but it would be more to the point to indict the American Bible Society, which is committing a similar offense daily and paying the postage.

C. R. Bennett, of California, has again been shot at, his escape from mortal injury indicating that bullets are not directed by any providence to be relied upon in an emergency. Bennett, who livs in Oakland, was formerly western agent of Anthony Comstock's Society for the Suppression of Vice. He is from New York, where, it is reported, he held the office of secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association. This report may be untrue, but there is nothing in Bennett's career to contradict it. When Bennett went West, he left a wife in the East. In Oakland he represented himself as unmarried, and his first exploit out there was the seduction of a school-girl named Gray. Like the Breckinridge-Pollard arrangement, it involved a promis to marry, but the wedding being long deferred the girl's parents organized an exploring expedition and found Bennett's wife. The girl did not bring suit for damages; she took a very sensible course, forbidding him to again visit her, and procuring employment for her own support. Then the villain blackmailed her; lied about her in the church of which he was a deacon, and endeavored by this means to force her into her former position toward him. Old man Gray appealed to him to let the girl alone, but he was altogether too mean a person to do that, so the parent pulled a gun and began pumping lead at him. Unfortunately Gray is half blind, which rendered his aim inaccurate. Bennett sustained no injury, but Gray was arrested for assault, and during the trial the facts came out. The jury acquitted the old man. Thereafter Deacon Bennett pursued the girl as before, and whenever she found a place he visited her employers and procured her dismissal by representing her as an immoral person. If I remember the circumstances as they were, he prevented her from obtaining a teacher's berth in the Oakland schools. At the same time he tried to bribe her to accept him again as her "friend." Latterly, the public has got on to Deacon Bennett's curves, and not long ago he was incontinently ejected from the establishment of a firm of stationers in whose employ Miss Gray happened at that time to be. I judge, however, that his sneaking tactics hav not been abandoned, as the papers state that on Saturday last the elder Gray opened fire on him again, slightly wounding him in the side. If there is a good occulist on the coast I believe that the public would remunerate him for fixing Mr. Gray's eyes so that next time he could hit his man at a vulnerable point.

My Western experience included an episode in which this Bennett figured. He came to one of Putnam's lectures with Clark Braden in tow, and demanded a hearing for that notorious swashbuckler. Putnam was discoursing on Genesis and geology, and did not care to be interrupted; besides, he declined to occupy the same platform with Braden. In answer to Bennett's inquiry why, Putnam candidly said that Braden was a liar and a rascal. At that Braden started up the aisle toward the front and I wandered after him. If he had attempted to reach the platform I was prepared to nail him, and there would hav been perspiration shed on the spot. Before he had gone far somebody suggested that the matter of listening to Braden be put to vote, which was done, all voting nay except Bennett. Both then made their escape, and the lecturer concluded his remarks. Bennett is now referred to as ex-agent of the vice society, but he ought to be reinstated, because in that position he might sometime run against an independent Californian who knows how to hold a gun.

How many people are there in the world who, if asked the meaning of the word "labor," would define it as "a term which, in a commercial sense, may represent value, condition, or quantity?" Just one, I think—to wit, Mr. Chas. O. Hays, of Locust Corner, Ohio. And how many, having listened to such a definition, would know any more about labor than they did before? None, in my opinion—certainly not the undersigned. The same definition applies to capital, to raw or manufactured material, to commerce, or anything else. I hold that that is not a good definition of one word which defines with equal exactness all the other words in the class to which it belongs. The simplest definition of labor is work; but the word has been more or less modified by custom. There is a very familiar figure of rhetoric known as metonymy—that is, the calling of one object by the name of another that sustains some relation to it. It is never misunderstood. For example, when we say that people are suffering for bread, we mean food; the power of gold means the power of money; the crown means the king, and the administration means the president. In the same manner a labor parade is a procession of laborers, a labor union is a combination of laborers, the labor vote consists of the ballots cast by laborers, the importation of labor is the bringing hither of laborers; and, also, free trade in labor is the absence of a tariff on laborers. Is there a tariff on laborers? The secretary of the board of immigration commissioners at this port informs me that there is not. The case, then, is this: That while the workingman must sell his labor for the same price as the foreigner, the manufacturer may charge the foreigner's price for his goods with the tariff added. Let us reverse the point and see whether Mr. Hays can feel it. To illustrate, then, impose a thousand dollars' tariff on every workingman brought to this country, and take all tariff off imported goods. Then we would hav the laborer where the manufacturer now is, and the manufacturer would occupy the present position of the laborer, as regards the tariff. Since Mr. Hays contends that protection for manufactures means protection also for labor, and that free trade in labor is possible only when accompanied by free trade in its products, will he hold that, under the reversed order, trade in labor would be free and manufacturers protected? If not, why not?

One of the Nine Demands of Liberalism makes the point that chaplains should be abolished from penitentiaries and other penal institutions. Peradventure it will become necessary to add a proviso to the same, exempting from its operations such chaplains as get there by due process of law. In the East river, a few miles from its mouth, is an island called Blackwell's, the site of a big jail, where New York city's petty offenders serve out the sentences imposed by the police courts. It is quite a populous resort, and has a chaplain in the person of the Rev. Cecil Pennyngton Wilson, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal denomination. These remarks are preliminary to the statement that a few days ago the Rev. Mr. Wilson took a day off from the duties of his holy office and came to the city for spiritual and intellectual repose. Nobody knows where he got it, but within a few hours he acquired a phenomenal load of whisky. Stationing himself at the corner of a street and an avenue uptown, he placed his hands beneath his clerical coattails and showed the nativs how to dance. As this seemed to please his auditors, who soon numbered some hundreds, he broke forth into song also, and then, by way of a collection, he hugged as many of the females in his congregation as would permit him to do so. A papist policeman interrupted the services by arresting Mr. Wilson, but the latter was agile and long-legged, and would hav effected his escape, but he had the misfortune to collide with a pillar of the elevated railroad. After that he went willingly to the station-house, praising the Lord all the way, and dropping asleep immediately upon his arrival. With waking came remorse and a fine of $10. But the Rev. Mr. Wilson was broke, and his pride prevented him from sending for a friend, so that there was nothing in view for him but a return to Blackwell's island as a member of his own flock. He had the presence of mind to point out to the justice this complicated state of affairs. It could not be expected of a clergyman, he said, to occupy a pulpit and a pew at the same time. The court saw the point, and considerately remitted the fine.

So the question of state-paid chaplains in penal institutions remains unsettled. While I am a thorough Secularist in this respect, I am not rabid enough to deny that under some circumstances their presence there is necessary to the maintenance of good order outside. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Zacharias and His Baby.

A certain priest named Zacharias, pious—
Says Luke, was blest with an Elysian vision.
His wife a daughter was of Aaron—barren—
And both were superannuated, fated,
As it might seem, to hav no baby—may-be.
So when he saw this angel, apparition, vision,
Or ghost, it only made his trouble double,
Until the angelic message, presage
Of yet an heir, made all his sadness gladness.
"And thou shalt call him John," this cad-head added.
Yet somewhat doubting Zacharias' pious
Requests some sign to what was spoken, token
In hand, earnest of promis, something, dumb thing!
Why, I am Gabriel! No higher flier
Flaps wing, for I am chief of Wingdom's kingdom.
You wish a sign! well, from my spirit hear it!
Signs, signs shall be your language, wholly, solely.
The ghost then spread his wings and tail to sail to
His happy nativ home in Wingdom's kingdom,
And left that ancient Zacharias pious,
Than even that unborn on-comer, dumber.
Now came the infant's time of christ'ning, list'ning
In vain, sat speechless Zacharias pious,
Relations—uncles, aunts, and cousins, dozens
Had come to feast and make it very merry.
These chose the name of its own father, rather Than that of distant kin; the mother other.
"It must be John," she cried, "sweet, bonny Johnny.'
"What do you mean by this cognomen, woman!
Not of the infant's kindred many, any
Was ever called by this cognomen, woman!"
Then they made signs to Zacharias pious
That he himself should do the naming, aiming
That they should thus ahead of Betsy get—see?
Then he made signs, his fingers going, showing
That he would do so if he might in writin'.
And then that good old Zacharias pious,
Did write, without a flaw or single jingle,
"His name is John," just as that cad had added.
Forthwith his mouth he opened quickly slickly;
He praised, prayed, preached completely neatly;
Sang sweetly meetly, and discretely featly.
Now I, like good old Zacharias pious,
Hav (being likewise smitten) written,
And fancy I can feel my hearing clearing
To catch the notes of no archean pean—
The future age with joyous singing ringing.
But I would scorn to call a baby "Gaby."
After that angel of untender gender,
That Magpie of the Christian churches' perches.

Progress of Our Missionary Work.

When any one sends us one dollar with the request that we mail a copy of "The Age of Reason" to each of the eight addresses of ministers, deacons, elders, and other Christians which accompany the money, we are sure that our correspondent is alive to the importance of disseminating good Liberal literature among church members and other religious believers. No better work for this purpose could be selected than the book we are scattering in this way from ocean to ocean. We print below a few of the letters which hav lately come to our desk freighted with dollars and names:

"NEW YORK, July 21, 1894.

"FRIEND MACDONALD: I feel like chipping in $1 to that TRUTH SEEKER missionary scheme, but I will leave it to you as to where the tracts are to be sent.

"E. B. FOOTE."

Eight of the representativs of the Court of Heaven who are located in this city were made the recipients of Dr. Foote's thoughtful kindness and untiring zeal.

"MARTIN'S STORE, ILL., July 16, 1894.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed please find $1 for Paine's 'Age of Reason,' to be sent to the persons named herein. WM. NIKSCH."

"SAVANNAH, MO., July 16, E.M. 294.

"MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 for the 'Age of Reason' to the inclosed names. I regard this as a grand scheme and will probably contribute more to it. Also inclose $1 for ten church property taxation pamphlets to myself.

"WM. COOK."

"MR. EDITOR: Within please find $2—one apply on my subscription, and for the other send as directed eight copies 'Age of Reason.' CHESTER BEDELL."

"KEARNEY, NEB., July 14, 1894.

"MR. E. M. MACDONALD—Dear Sir: I would like to take advantage of your liberal offer in TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th, so inclosed you will find $1, for which please send 'Age of Reason' to eight names given.

"Respectfully, C. F. ROBINSON."

"LA RUE, O., July 20, 1894.

"MR. E. M. MACDONALD—Dear Sir: Find inclosed $2; also sixteen names, to each of which please send one copy of that grand eye-opener, Thomas Paine's 'Age of Reason.' I consider this the grandest missionary scheme that was ever started in the cause of Freethought. Once you get the people to read the other side and do their own thinking, the priest's job is gone. HENRY WEISE."

"WATERTOWN, MINN., July 19, 1894.

"MR. E. M. MACDONALD: Dear Sir: Seeing your generous offer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th, I take advantage of it and inclose you $1, for which please send by return mail one copy of Thomas Paine's 'Age of Reason' to each of the addresses accompanying this.

"You will notice that I hav down the names of two ministers, neither of whom is very fond of Paine. One day I heard one speaking against Paine and Voltaire, and I asked him if he had ever read any of Paine's writings. He said that he had not and I should judge that the other one is not any more enlightened, but if they will read the 'Age of Reason' perhaps a ray of light may penetrate the orthodox fog that clouds their brains. Hoping that your offer will be taken advantage of by all who can afford it, and that it will accomplish much good, I remain yours for truth and reason, JOHN P. THORNQUEST."

This is encouraging. One "Age of Reason" shall put to confusion ten thousand Bibles—to slightly change a scripture hyperbolism and bring it more nearly into harmony with reason and facts.

Time to Be Moving.

The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are all sufficiently informed of the facts in the case of Mr. J. B. Wise, the last arrest of a Liberal under the Comstock obscene literature mail law. They know that this earnest, wide-awake worker was confined during four long weeks, between the ninth of June and the middle of July, in jail at Leavenworth, Kansas, for mailing a postal card containing only a quoted extract from the Old Testament. He is now out on bail through the kindness of his Liberal brother, George Harrison, of Clay Center, Kansas, awaiting trial in October next. The National Defense Association has held two meetings to consider what ought to be done in this matter, and has decided that it is time to make a general call upon the Liberals of the country to stand by the one in distress. It is not only necessary that we should do all that can be done to prevent injustice and punishment being inflicted upon Mr. Wise, but it is also important that this event should be made use of to create as much discussion as possible as to the moral quality and character of scriptural texts and the question whether millions of books should be distributed in the hands of young and old if one brief verse here or there may be bad enough to cause the imprisonment of a man who quotes and sends it by mail. A good many very interesting problems and opinions will be likely to be brought out in the full and wide discussion of this affair. If the Liberals of the country will provide a liberal fund for offense as well as defense, it would be employed as judiciously as we know how to awaken public sentiment previous to the trial and to defend Mr. Wise on trial. There are practically only about two months to work in, and therefore we request an immediate response to this call for subscriptions from all who are willing to chip in and lend a hand in making this a celebrated case. The chip is knocked off our shoulder and it is time to show what we are good for. It is some time since we hav had such a fight on hand, and really a long time since the Liberals hav been called on for any subscription to the Defense Fund. Subscriptions may be forwarded directly to THE TRUTH SEEKER office or to E. B. FOOTE, Jr., Sec. N. D. A., 120 Lexington ave., New York city.

The newspapers say that in Muncie, Indiana, the preachers and Christian Endeavorers hav had an ordinance passed requiring all business houses to be closed on Sunday. This is a mistake; the churches are running wide open morning, afternoon, and evening, and reliable reports state that the proprietors are taking in more than the usual receipts owing to the cutting off of competition.

We are informed that the audiences at the Moody services at the capital "were almost entirely made up of church members." This would seem to indicate that even that popular expounder of the word cannot always reach the "unchurched masses," a majority of whom are already Christians, but are not inclined to "work at their religion." The old fanatical zeal grows weaker and weaker, and it is well for the race that it does. A nobler enthusiasm is taking its place.

Among the two hundred men, women, and children "converted" at the Moody revival in Washington, how many were converted to Christianity from any other great world religion or from Infidelity? Possibly one or two; probably not any. What does the "conversion" mean, then? Simply that two hundred Christians, not members of any church immediately preceding their "change of heart," hav been induced to affiliate with Christian organizations, and that some of them will, for a time, at least, attempt to order their lives more in harmony with those social precepts which the church has appropriated from the common store of human ethics and now claims as her private property. But most of the "saved" souls will be content with a temporary outward observance of certain fashionable conventions which hav little if any relation to essential conduct, while nearly all of them will be made more intolerant of differences of opinion and consequently less just in their dealings with their non-believing or differently-believing fellows.

W. S. Bell is now lecturing in Kansas, helping to prepare the minds of the Liberals for the coming intellectual feast. His address is 114 East Fourth street, Topeka, Kan.

Letters of Friends.

Two Years and Eight Ages.

RIDGEWAY, N. Y., July 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6, for which please credit my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years and send $1 worth of "Paine's Age of Reason" to the addresses given. I write hoping some good may result. GEO. L. PRATT.

Somewhat Liberal Out There.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., July 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Baseball playing has been all the rage here on Sundays this summer and spring. The church people did considerable growling in the early part of spring, through the local papers, about it. At this time the boys had their playgrounds away down on the prairie among the coyotes, but later they secured grounds almost under the nose of the church, as it were. A few years ago a like attempt was made, but was suppressed by the strong arm of the law—by fining the boys. How times hav changed! When popular opinion is against church rule she is as harmless as a lamb; when in her favor she is ferocious as a lion. The boys drew immense crowds to witness their games, and hence the church's lamblike disposition. She hoped that by such a course she could induce the boys to drop their nickels in the slot.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

An "Original" Freethinker.

HAWKINS, N. Y., July 17, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Although I am somewhat tardy this year in my remittances, I believe it is the first time since I hav been a subscriber. I would hav sent my subscription before, but I wanted to take your offer and hav my name inscribed on the everlasting monument of that grand and good man, Samuel P. Putnam, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," therefore I inclose $6.50. I wish you would see to it that the name of my father, William Thompson Galloway, is placed there also. He has subscribed for the book. He has been a Freethinker for the last forty years or more. His Freethought was "original." I hav heard him say that he was of that belief for twenty years before he knew there was another person in the world who believed as he did. He had never seen a Freethought tract or publication of any character. He has probably read the Bible through more times than Talmage has, and that is the cause of his Freethought.

WM. S. GALLOWAY.

Mortuary—Joseph Maxwell Libby.

HASTINGS, PA., July 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: A good man, a stanch Freethinker, and a radical has disappeared; a busy, activ life on earth is stilled. Joseph Maxwell Libby was born in Saco, Maine, June 17, 1810, and passed away June 9, 1894, at 11 P.M., at his home near Hastings, Pa. His sickness was short; he took to his bed but two weeks before his death, which was peaceful and without a struggle. He became unconscious several hours before passing away.

He received but a common school education, but being very fond of reading he soon evoluted into more light and became a Freethinker of the broadest and most advanced type. Though quiet and unassuming in manner he was always among the advance guard in reform, ready to accept any truth and to aid in any cause tending to free the race from any and all forms of superstition and tyranny. He was a great reader, having a library of history and the various reforms of our time, and was familiar with most of them.

He left a wife, eighty-six years of age, and two sons, besides other relativs. The funeral was held at Chest Springs, Wednesday, June 11th, Mr. Dawson officiating. Our friend was a firm believer in immortality. Liberal, just, and charitable to all is the record of Mr. Libby.

SUE DOWNEY.

Will Not Co-operation of Ranchmen Solve the Problem?

FAYETTE, IDA., July 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6.50. This is for a year's subscription and Brother Putnam's great book. Procrastination is the thief of time, and I hav had to let her procrastinate, and now I am obliged to let some others wait for that which is due them, so that we can hav our names enrolled with, I hope, three thousand others in this book of all books. There are quite a number of Liberals in this vicinity and there could be a very good society organ if only some lecturer would come this way. Yet hard times are here, made harder by the monkeying with the wool tariff, as there are a great many sheep raised on our hills. Then we hav a cussed corporation that has dug a ditch and wants to control all the land under and above it. By unscrupulousness and misrepresentation it has so far kept the farmers from digging an independent ditch. The strike tied up the railroad, but as it happened there was not much fruit to ship. If the government would pay more attention to the water question and not delay in digging ditches in the arid region, so that the farmers could own the water with the land and hav to pay only for maintaining the canal they would be more prosperous and happy. As it now is, no man with limited means can open out a sage brush ranch and pay the assessments now asked, with the prospects of having to pay more, and be happy or independent in five years, say. Some think that this corporation is a lamb, but they are sure to find it another Pullman in its demands. Yours for liberty, DR. A. A. BRAUTHOOVER.

How Would They Vote?

UKIAH, CAL., July 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: You will recollect the little package of seven books which I got from your office some eight months since consisting entirely of Old Testament Illustrated, as a trial package in the retail trade. Well, six of the seven were disposed of to different individuals of professed Liberal sentiments, and men of families. Two were sold on time, but instead of pay for the books forthcoming, one of them has been returned, with the statement that the purchaser's wife insisted on its removal from the house. The other man has just informed me that his wife holds a standing threat over him that if he ever pays for that book she will leave him, and if she can get sight of old man McCowen she will throw the book at his head. This givs you a glimps of the status of the retail trade of Liberal literature in this vicinity and the spirit manifested in opposition to its distribution, and against any one who may engage in the line of missionary work. Whoever engages in it puts himself very much in the position of him who throws pearls before swine. Of course, Brother Putnam's narrow escape in our courthouse escapade and the narrow escape from a general conflagration of our forty thousand dollar court-house has not been forgotten; and, of course, such occurrences and similar incidents are well calculated to stir up our "pure minds by way of remembrance," and likewise to prove to a demonstration that the opponents of Freethought are determined it shall not be forgotten, or at least the spirit which heretofore has prompted these deeds of ostracism and persecution shall still be fanned and kept alive. Therefore, it would seem to me that it would be well for Liberals to take our opponents at their word, and at least not leave them the privilege of saying we are treating them with silent contempt. Yours for reform, THOS. MCCOWEN.

"Labor" Defined.

LOCUST CORNER, O., July 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th, friend George Macdonald asks two questions of me, namely:

1. What did I suppose he meant by "free trade in labor?"

2. What do I mean by "no free trade in labor?"

I reply that before I had read his remarks in the last issue I supposed he meant precisely what he said, viz., free trade in labor; but since he has explained that he meant the absence of a tariff on immigrants, that supposition is no longer tenable. I could not assume that free labor meant free laborers, any more than he would assume that free wheat would mean free harvesting machinery.

A laborer, according to my understanding, is an individual who performs labor; while labor is a term which, in a commercial sense, may represent value, condition, or quantity. A piece of unmined iron ore is of little or no value, but when changed by labor into watch-springs may represent thousand of dollars.

Thus we may assume that labor represents an average of 90 per cent of all value; and if we admit foreign goods free of duty we shall hav free trade in labor, but upon no other conditions.

The bundle of foreign manufactured goods contains a certain value in labor already performed, which might otherwise hav been performed in America, and lessens by its own amount the opportunities of American labor to obtain employment.

That the portion of our labor which is done abroad cannot be done here would seem to be an axiom needing no demonstration, and a tariff levied upon the fruits of foreign labor is a tariff on labor itself, rendering free trade in labor an impossibility. CHAS. O. HAYS.

There is Some Growth.

NORTH BENTON, O., July 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great lever to break the power of the clergy. I hav seen a revolution in religious dogma; I hav seen the time when Infidels were tarred and feathered and ridden on a rail in this township. There is a revolution in that respect here. Few hold to the religious dogmas now but the low in intellect. I hav seen the time here that most any average Christian would swear in court that he would not believe an Infidel. I hav heard them asked the reason they could not be believed, and the answer was that they did not believe the book called the Bible. But times are not what they were. I hav heard a preacher, who was also a professor in Hiram College, at Hiram, O., say in his sermon that man had an environment greater than that of any other sentient being, and beyond that environment he knew nothing; there was a veil, and beyond that veil he knew nothing; and he also said, in connection with that subject, that the scientific men of this age had demonstrated facts contrary to former Biblical theories, and they were all skeptical. He also said that their best clergymen in Cleveland had attended Liberal lectures, and he told his congregation the next Sunday that he heard arguments that he could not answer. I told the clergyman at the close of his sermon that if he kept on preaching such sermons he would hav his congregation Infidels. He said that he hoped not, but the Bible must be taken in a different light from that in which it had been viewed formerly. There are indications of the dropping off of the divinity of the Bible. We can see that a great majority of the adherents to the church are such to hide some meanness and dump their wickedness on some scapegoat, as taught in the Book. The divinity part of the Bible, in my judgment, was conceived in fraud. Why not teach the people to do right for the love and beauty of doing right?

CHESTER BEDELL.

Outdoes Brother Peck.

July 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I do not wish to interfere with the discussion of Messrs. Peck and Perry, but I feel that Brother Peck is quite lame in his reasoning as well as an illiberal Liberal; and as he seems to sit at ease on scientific positivness, I wish to ask him some questions for my own information, the answers to which I cannot otherwise obtain.

I am an idiotic Agnostic Materialist, believing in no personal or individual god, devil, ghost, witch, or hoodoo; neither do I accept the truthfulness of the miraculous conception, Jonah, Samson, or rib stories, but am rather a believer in attraction, repulsion, and some few other forces said to exist, and to settle my mind on the subject more fully I wish Mr. Peck would explain to my rather incomprehensiv intellect what attraction is, for if it is anything it must be something and hav materiality, dimensions, etc., and take up some part of space. I wish to know how it looks, feels, or tastes, also how it smells—whether beautiful as a rose, sickly as a dead carcass, or "divine" as a death-bed repentance? Has it weight or tangibility, and can it be compressed or expanded, and what is its analysis? When a boy I used to hear my teacher say, "Matter is classed in three divisions—solids, liquids, and gaseous;" and I know not which head covers attraction, repulsion, the centripetal and centrifugal forces, neither polarity, mesmerism, and some other things that both Webster and science undertake to explain, but which, like a "spirit," are too abstruse for my understanding. Is it not a fact that science hides itself behind a mountain of words in telling us many truths, yet leaves us in the dark as to the nature rather than the effects of many things?

I know not how the variegated rose derives its kaleidscope of colors from the same root, soil, moisture, atmosphere, and really would like Brother Peck to explain. I know nature is a grand old mother.

The theory of sound waves which enable us to hold conversation through brick walls is good but not satisfactory to my reason; we recognize the voice of a friend through the telephone, yet science does not explain why the peculiarity of voices. Should I catch Mr. Peck in Chicago and ask him to describe to me his home in Buffalo, would not his mind seemingly hav to return to Buffalo before he could giv me anything of a description? Why need the store-house of memory "take a walk" (if it does) before it can giv a reflectiv answer?

Mr. Peck says, "I never had an opportunity to investigate Spiritualism," and from his own words I condemn him as an illiberal Liberal, for he has no right to take what others may say pro or con on a subject he knows nothing of personally and condemn it, when he has every chance to learn the truth of the subject for himself. Four years ago I was forced to acknowledge from personal observation the truthfulness of spirit phenomena (although I had discovered frauds), but being very skeptical, I reasoned that it might not be caused by "spirits," but the reflex of my own brain or knowledge or from other laws of nature unknown to me and perhaps unknown to science, for I hav long since thought that what man really knows compared to what he does not know is like a molehill to a mountain. I wish to remind Mr. Peck that I am not a full-fledged spiritist, but still an investigator, and wish him or some other learned scientist to tell me how it is that public lecturers from Maine to California, who hav no way of knowing me from other idiots in their audiences, pick me out, leave their rostrum, and come to me, saying: "Your son Frank sends me to tell you he is here and wishes to tell you that he is always with you." Also I hav often had old friends and relativs, many of whom I had nearly forgotten, come (or said to "be here") and tell their names and incidents in their lives that "stagger my understanding," and I wish Mr. Peck to explain whence comes the intelligence. How can they tell me where I will be on a certain day, which invariably comes true, when I had no such thought at the time. I believe in more than three divisions of matter and that what is called spirit is but a certain consistency of matter of which science has not yet learned. If Spiritualism is true, every thing as well as man livs in the shadowy future in an evoluted state and much more refined and perfected than in earth life. My spirit friends seem to know of no god, devil, or savior, and say there is no literal heaven or hell, but that with spirit eyes they can see, spirit skulls can think, and if John Peck is not fully intelligent and perpetually "flavored" he can by the law of evolution hav a "chance for his life" and continue toward perfection after death, and never will hav to fry in an orthodox hell in obedience to the dictates of pope or vicegerent of Jehovah.

How beautiful, if true, to know that we are to clasp glad hands with those loved ones from whom death has separated us; to impress a loving kiss upon a remembered mother, who so fondly nursed us at her bosom in earth life! How cheerful the evoluted songs of birds as they perch upon the more perfected branches of spiritual trees that know no decay! Can it be thus?

Brother Peck, let us investigate and hope that no hell is to torture an innocent darling, forced by the hand of nature into an eternal damnation; neither that mother's love is to be cleft asunder by the sword of mortality. A. D. SWAN.

The God of Moses.

RAPID RIVER, MICH., July 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In reading the old Mosaic legends it cannot escape the notice of any critical reader that the acts for which God rewarded and applauded his favorits would send them to the penitentiary to-day. And these acts must hav been looked upon as crimes in all ages and among all classes of men. We believe the explanation is this: Moses worshiped the serpent, which he believed to be the incarnation of evil, and naturally he believed that evil was what he approved.

Although Bibles are plentiful, few read them except Freethinkers, and in support of our position we will recount a few of the acts done by God's favorits.

Abraham made a journey into Egypt, and while there his aged wife, Sarah, because of her beauty caught Pharaoh's eye and he inquired of Abraham who she was, and Abraham said she was his sister, and Pharaoh took her to wife. As s on as Pharaoh discovered the fraud he, like an honorable, upright man, returned her. Pharaoh and all his house were punished for his honorable conduct, while the liar Abraham was comforted with great promises. All this occurred over again with Abimelech, king of the Philistines, and again the honorable king was punished and the lying rascal Abraham rewarded. God's punishment of Abimelech was something very remarkable (Gen. xx, 13). As far as satisfying justice went, God's judgment might as well hav lighted on a grindstone. But had this attempt to palm off his octogenarian wife as his sister on an unsuspicious man been proved in any of our police courts, the father of the faithful would hav served a term in the house of correction.

In Gen. xxi, 14, we hav the story of Abraham turning his wife Hagar and their son adrift into the wilderness of Beersheba: "And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, and putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away." This was a piece of cool rascality, as turning a woman and child adrift in the wilderness meant murder in intention, and yet God approved of the act. This story is inconsistent and unreliable, as we find in Gen. xvii, 25: "And Ishmael his son was thirteen years old, when he was circumcised." The journeyings and adventures which are recorded since then would make Ishmael at least twenty, perhaps thirty, years of age. Poor old Hagar! no wonder you gave out, staggering through the wilderness of Beersheba with all the provisions and a full-grown man on your back.

Our own modesty and the Comstock obscenity laws forbid us going into the details of the Lot scandal, but we must say that as we never read nor heard of as flagrant a case of incest as occurred among the Lotites, it is reasonable to suppose they were kicked out of somewhere for their immoral practices, and in that way secured a passport to the favor of the God of Moses.

In reading Abraham's record thus far, any thinker would naturally conclude that if God was searching for an unprincipled scoundrel from whom to raise a peculiar breed, Abraham was the man he was seeking; but God's final test seems to hav been to discover if he had a grain of humanity left; if it was not for this purpose, we fail to see what it was for: "And God said, take now thy son, thine only son, Isaac, whom thou lovest and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains I shall tell thee of" (Gen. xxii, 2). To this Abraham never made a protest, but, as if delighted with the job, got up early in the morning and started with Isaac on his murderous mission, and as if anxious to crowd in every item which would add to the horror and cruelty of his act, he made Isaac carry the wood on which he meant to butcher and burn him. When Abraham had the sacrificial knife upraised to take Isaac's life God arrested his hand. If a civilized human being in our Western world had arrested his hand in this act, Abraham would hav spent the remainder of his days behind penitentiary bars, and been pointed out to the curious visitor as the monster who tried to murder his own son in such a brutal manner. This is in all probability a warped edition of an old Aryan or Hindoo legend, where a king with a large family of daughters but no sons in brooding over his sonless state came to look upon it as a reproach and made a vow to God if he granted him a son he would offer him up a sacrifice. His prayer was granted and a son was born unto him, and, with one excuse and another, he kept the child and put God off from time to time. At length God agreed to allow the king to keep his son until he was twenty-one, at which time the sacrifice was to take place without fail. Before the fatal day arrived the son, warned of his danger, fled into a neighboring kingdom, and the king tried to get out of the difficulty by declaring his son beyond his jurisdiction. God was very much displeased, but finally agreed to accept a substitute. The king was a long time seeking, but at length found a rascal who was willing, for a hundred cows, to sell his son to be sacrificed. When the priest was sharpening the sacrificial knife the substitute, who was bound to the altar, seeing his danger called out lustily in his terror to all the gods whose names he could remember and Vahwas (the dawn), hearing his cries, came to his assistance, when his bands fell off and he stood up free. In the wind up the great God commends the king for saving his son and the greedy trading villain who sold his own flesh and blood is condemned. These are the main points in the old legend, and it is too evident to require comment that the people who made it believed in a god fairly virtuous, while those who warped it to fit our Bible believed in a god entirely vicious.

Jacob was God's especial favorit and an all-around scoundrel. If he had begun life in the United States with a twenty-dollar pack of shoddy, in ten years he would hav been a Congressional lobbyist and boodler swindling the country out of millions. He forced his brother Esau, who was dying of hunger, to sell him the land of Canaan for a bowl of soup, as the birthright, according to the story, meant this. He perjured himself twice to secure his father's blessing. By knavish schemes he robbed his father-in-law. By a pious, lying, religious ruse he and his sons got the Shechemites in their power and butchered them in cold blood. And we are forced to believe from his record that to help his own interests he was capable of committing any crime ever thought of by man. We hav from his record a highway robber and murderer, a perjured liar, a brother-deceiver and -hater, and a knavish thief. Is there a man in all the prisons and penitentiaries of the world to-day with a reputation as bad as this? And Esau was a noble, upright, forgiving man, for after all Jacob's treachery he forgave him and took him in his arms and wept over him; wept no doubt to think Jacob was his brother and such a scoundrel; and God declares, "Jacob hav I loved and Esau hav I hated." It is impossible to conceive a plainer declaration that he loved evil and hated good. As these Esau and Jacob tales are all inconsistent and incredible, it is likely they are a warped edition of another old Aryan legend, where a noble, upright elder brother forgivs and shows great kindness to a poverty-stricken, broken-down, vagabond younger brother, who in their youth had done him great injury. The most careless reader will see at a glance that these tales, as they stand in our Bible, are fables and poorly told. Neither Esau nor Jacob had left their father's establishment at the time of the birthright trade, and their father must hav been immensely wealthy, as Abraham when he fought with and defeated Chederlaomer, had three hundred and eighteen fighting men born in his own house; and the Lord had been blessing and prospering the outfit ever since, and two thousand is a moderate estimate of Isaac's household, if there is any truth in the story. And Esau, the prospectiv lord of all these people, on his return from hunting, would hav been waited on and attended like a prince, and when we find him begging and selling his birthright for a bowl of soup in his wealthy father's establishment, even the religious fanatic must admit it is a fraud. When Isaac gave Jacob his blessing he was an old, feeble, blind, bedridden man, and yet we find he did not die till eighty years afterward. These contradictions and inconsistencies are far too glaring to be either ignored or denied, and leave no doubt on the mind that they are not in the form in which they were first told. In all probability the original legend exalted virtue, while our warped edition crowns vice with an aureole. The man who first told these legends would hav an eye to consistency for reputation's sake; but the man who warped them would care nothing for this if they served his purpose, which was evidently to unite piety and crime.

We will now take a look at some of the crimes of Moses. In Ex. xxxii we read that when Moses was away on law-making intent, in his sanctum sanctorum, on Mount Sinai, the priests and people, when freed from their fear of Moses, made a god in the form of a calf. They would no doubt hav made a full-grown bull had the stolen gold ornaments held out. When Moses returned and saw this calf his indignation burst all bounds, and the tables on which he and God had spent forty days and forty nights he broke to pieces in his rage. And he took the calf, and burned it and ground it to powder, and mixed the powder with water, and made the people drink it (he stole the gold without doubt, and made the people drink the ashes of the fire mixed with sand). When this was done he held a council to investigate. And Aaron, put on the witness stand, tells his story (verse 22): "Let not the anger of my lord wax hot, thou knowest the people, that they are set on mischief, for they said unto me, Make us gods, which shall go before us, for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what has become of him; and I said unto them, whosoever hath any gold, let them break it off, and they gave it me. Then I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf." It must be admitted that this was a miracle. Without forming, molding, or intention, this god created itself, not out of nothing but out of gold, and took the form of a calf; and, what makes it more perplexing, Aaron frankly acknowledged that he collected the gold to make an idol, and it could, from our standpoint, make little difference what form it was fashioned in, but there was good reasons for Aaron telling this lie, disclaiming all intention of making it a calf, to which we will call attention later. Moses has been called the great lawgiver, and we see in this case how he administered law. After examining Aaron, Moses stood in the gate of the camp and called to all who were on the Lord's side to come to him, and the Levites came to his side, and he told them to take their swords, and, in the words of the book: "Go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his friend; and the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses, and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men, for Moses had said, Consecrate yourselvs to-day to the Lord, even every man upon his son and upon his brother, that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day." What a god to receive a blessing from! If you had not slain a brother, or a son, or some dear friend, you were unworthy of a blessing. No trial, evidence, or judgment, but the sword was drawn, and haphazard, pell mell descended on the heads of the people. The more slain and the nearer and dearer they were to the slayer, the better God would like it. Could any man working in the interests of the incarnation of evil, hav devised a surer method of outraging, degrading, and vitiating all the best instincts of humanity? When we examin this story critically, it seems that the slaughter was among the Levites themselvs; it is sons and brothers that are to be slain; not the men of other tribes. And all the religious squabbles that took place were confined to the Levites. This is curious and excites suspicion as to the respectability of the God of Moses, for of necessity Aaron and the Levites would know more of his God than the rest of the people, and although he was very generous to them, they seem to hav had little love for him, and had not Moses returned at this time, God's peculiar people, led by Aaron, would hav deserted to a man; and the strained relations which we can see existed between Moses and Aaron, all the way through the story, must at last hav reached a climax. In proof of this we only need to read Num. xx, 25, 26: "Take Aaron and Eleazar his son, and bring them up into Mount Hor, and strip Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son, and Aaron shall be gathered unto his people, and shall die there." We hav here a cold-blooded murder, very piously told. As soon as Aaron was disposed of Moses lost no time in setting up the image of his own God. Num. xxi, 8: "And the Lord said unto Moses, make thee a fiery serpent and set upon a pole, and it shall come to pass that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, he shall liv." The natural instinctiv abhorrence the human hav to the serpent family made this a very unpopular god, as we can understand from the howling, angry remonstrances of its prophets, and the seceders seem to hav been in the majority, until a priest, shrewder than his predecessors, stirred up King Hezekiah to destroy all images, holy serpent as well as the rest (2 Kings xviii, 4), and issue the second commandment forbidding image worship, and the void, endowed by this priest, through the imagination of his dupes, with the serpent's attributes, modified and improved, they were enjoined to worship. This void, they were told, was everywhere, and took notes of all their actions, especially their evil ones, and even their thoughts were not private to themselvs, for the void overheard them. Of course neither the priests nor their dupes pretended to comprehend this muddle; but this made it more fascinating as there is nothing the human race takes such delight in as humbug in the shape of a mystery, and this, as the priest had shrewdly guessed, was the most popular god ever made by man, and the cheapest, as the priest made it by a word of his mouth. This destroys the fiction that Moses issued the second commandment; how can we believe that Moses who commanded and compelled his followers to trample the second, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth commandments under feet, made them? The blackest page in history is the Mosaic raid on Midian; the Midianites had been the best of friends to Moses; when he fled from justice, a murderer, they took him in, and he married a daughter of one of their chief men. And when he returned with his slavery-sodden people they were all made welcome, and camped on the borders of the land of Midian. In Num. xxv we find Israel gone wandering after Baal-Peor, the god of Moab; and to counteract this Moses held a revival meeting, and when the people were worked up to the hallelujah state and the serpent god coming out a winner, Zimra, an Israelite, went past on his way to his tent, with Cozbi, a woman of Midian, whom it would seem he had taken to wife. This probably distracting the attention of the penitents, enraged Moses and his priests, and one of them, Phinehas by name, took up a javelin (verse 8); and he went after the man of Israel, into the tent, and thrust both of them through, the man of Israel and the woman. This pleased and pacified God and Moses; and on the spot Phinehas was promised an everlasting priesthood. And God told Moses to vex the Midianites for this. As Moses was married to a Midianitish woman, and the Midianites seem to hav been the best people, it would hav puzzled a Philadelphia lawyer to make a case out of this, but the Midianites had just cause of complaint for the death of Cozbi. But the Lord had a very peculiar way of balancing justice; if he was on the bench to-day and had the same ideas of justice he had then, if a murderer came before him, he would hang all the murdered man's relativs and friends, perhaps the whole village where he had lived, if it was a wicked, wilful murder, and then take the murderer home to dine. God, thinking Moses too slow, again called his attention to the Midianites (Num. xxxi), and he sent twelve thousand soldiers to slaughter them. They killed the unoffending men, and brought back the women and children captiv; this threw the meek Moses into another rage, and he commanded the Israelites to take all the maidens who had never known man, and butcher the rest, both women and children, of whom there were sixteen thousand; out of this sixteen thousand, thirty-two were sacificed as a heave offering unto the Lord. The maidens whose lives were spared numbered thirty-two thousand, and after seeing their kindred slain, they were handed over as a prey to this licentious soldiery, to be torn from the arms of one brutal ruffian and clasped in the foul embrace of another, ruffians bespattered with the blood of their nearest and dearest, and all for the glory of God.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Soulless Prayers.

I do not like to hear him pray
On bended knee about an hour,
For grace to spend aright the day,
Who knows his neighbor has no flour.

I'd rather see him go to mill
And buy the needy brother bread,
And see his children eat their fill
And laugh beneath their humble shed.

I do not love to hear him pray—
"Let blessings on the widow be,"
Who never seeks her home to say—
"If wart o'ertake you, come to me."

I hate a prayer so loud and long,
That's offered for the orphan's weal,
By him who sees him crushed by wrong.
And only with the lips doth feel.

I do not like to hear her pray,
With jeweled hand and silken dress,
Whose washerwoman toils all day
And then is asked to work for less.

Such "pious" falsehoods I despise!
The folded hands, the face demure,
Of those with sanctimonious eyes,
Who steal the earnings of the poor,

Those sainted faces that some wear
To church and for the public eye,
Hide things that are not on the square,
And wickedness done on the sly.

I do not like such soulless prayers!
If wrong I pray to be forgiven;
Such prayers no angel upward bears—
They vanish ere they get to heaven.

The Inquirendo Club.

III.

"We hav here," said Florence, with much formality, holding up a small visiting card, "the name of Prof. Agassiz H. Morse, of the New York Historical Society, with the modest request penciled underneath to 'admit one.' Of course, the matter rests with the club for decision. What shall it be—aye or no?" "Oh, aye, of course! How delightful," they all exclaimed, while Arthur observed that the pater was a "trump." Ernestine declared it was so fortunate. "For," she said, "with his exhaustiv knowledge Uncle Agassiz could giv us so much valuable information."

Because the professor was no other than the father of our president, Master Arthur, Lillie and the three younger children, Ralph, Wilfred, and tiny Miss Rosalie, aged three, who always attended the club meetings, perched upon Aunt Margaret's lap, gravely listening to the various subjects of discussion. Now, she observed that she hoped papa would tell about pillow-flies. "I hope she will, Dodo," rejoined Arthur, "for I am sure I havn't the ghost of an idea what you mean by 'pillow-flies.' Not the kind that haunt pillows, surely," he asked, as though frightened by the suggestion, "I know all about them." "O Arthur," laughed his sister, "don't you see? She means butterflies, and calls them 'pillow-flies,' because papa explained the word metamorphosis to us one evening, using the transformation of a caterpillar into a butterfly as an illustration. Dodo heard him, and has been talking of 'pillow-flies' ever since. No, dear," she continued, unfolding the leaves of a rather bulky looking manuscript, "papa has chosen a more prosaic subject this time for an essay, but one which I am sure will be none the less interesting. He desires me to read it before this club, as business commands his attention elsewhere this afternoon. Now be very attentive, for I am confident it will contain many important facts. As for myself, I can only hope that I shall do justice to it." And then she read:

"EARTH-WORMS AND THEIR USES."

"Charles Darwin, in his work upon 'The Formation of the Vegetable Mould Through the Action of Earth-Worms' shows very plainly that no object is too small or insignificant to be deserving of our attention, since much of the earth's condition and richness of soil is due to the existence of these little creatures. Every plant or animal has its particular purpose, and years of exhaustiv research has convinced the great scientist that the least of these are not earthworms. He tells us of the burial of an ancient Roman villa at Abinger, Surrey, kept in an excellent state of preservation by the castings of earthworms, and adds that archæologists are probably not aware of how much they owe to worms for the preservation of their ancient objects, as anything left undisturbed upon the earth's surface for a short time is completely hidden from sight by the action of these worms. Although of a terrestrial nature they can liv under water for a considerable time, inhabiting low, marshy places, where vegetable matter grows. Dryness is unfavorable, and sometimes even fatal to them. During the dry months of summer, and the frozen period in winter, they burrow into the ground quite deep, and cease to work.

"Worms are nocturnal in their habits, and can be seen at night crawling over the ground, more often moving their heads and bodies, with their tails still in the burrow. Only sickly worms, covered with the parasitic larva of a fly, hav the disposition to travel in the day time. Those seen dead on the ground after a heavy rain are supposed to hav been creatures afflicted in some way that hav died of weakness rather than drowning.

"Worms hav no eyes, yet owing to a peculiar sensitivness are enabled to distinguish night from day. Mr. Darwin, in a course of interesting experiments, has shown how a continued stream of moderate daylight affects them. Heat they are inclined to disregard, while being extremely averse to cold, quickly retreating into their burrow when struck by a sudden wave of fresh air. They possess a certain amount of intelligence for so minute a creature, as Mr. Darwin further explained, lining their tiny caves with leaves and leaf stalks, for the obvious purpose of keeping warm. Care and careful manipulation is rendered necessary in drawing the leaves inward to fold nicely, but the little furnishers are equal to the occasion, discriminating between the easiest way to draw the leaf in and other ways.

"Closer investigation shows how the seeds owe their germination to having been covered up by 'castings' of the worm. Others, more deeply buried, lie dormant until brought forward under conditions favorable to germination, by the working over of the earth by worms.

"It is thus we learn the earnest, useful lesson wherein nature has decreed that each one, great and small, shall liv for something; that

'Small service is true service while it lasts.'

"'The plow,' said Mr. Darwin, in conclusion, 'is one of the most ancient and valuable of man's inventions; but long before he existed the land was in fact regularly plowed and still continues to be plowed by earth worms. It may be doubted whether there are many other animals which hav played so important a part in the history of the world as hav these lowly-organized creatures.'"

"And now," said Florence, in conclusion, "we hav some illustrations to examin, if you wish."

"I think not this time," said Aunt Margaret, rising. "It is after four now, so we will postpone all further conversation until next time."

Little Rosalie, or "Dodo," as they called her, slipped from auntie's lap, apparently disgusted with the essay. They were amused to hear her exclaim as she walked away, "Nasty worm! My dracious!"

"She don't like them as well as the 'pillow-flies,'" laughed Florence. "I am afraid onr Dodo is inclined to be esthetic."

"At any rate she has helped break up the meeting," said Arthur, as he helped Florence put away the curiosities the kind professor had sent, and the untouched quirendo box. IDA BALLOU.

Heaven and Hell.

James Taylor, Willard Grav, and Tom Lindsmore were a trio of as rascally rascals as ever trod the earth. They had lied, cheated, forged notes, robbed, and I believe once killed a man. James died a natural death, repenting at the eleventh hour of his sins, and went to heaven, where, after resting awhile in Abraham's bosom, he was arrayed in a white gown and given a harp. He did not know how to play, so held it in his hands and made believe while kneeling with the other saints around the great, shining white throne where God sat listening with a very high crown of gold and jewels on his head. He did not seem to notice that one harp made no noise, and so James was happy, at least for the present. Sometime afterward Willard and Joe were killed on the plains by Indians, and had no time to repent. They were, therefore, sent to hell. When they arrived at the gate the old devil was away; probably "tempting mortals," and the young devils were having a grand time playing ball just outside, and so engaged were they that they did not notice our friends' arrival. So they hid behind a pile of brimstone that was waiting to be shoveled in when it should be needed, and after counseling together awhile, they determined to go to heaven and tell the servants that a mistake had been made and the devil had sent them back to heaven. They accordingly went and told this story, which was believed, and they were taken in, divested of their clothing, and given a white dress like the others to wear, and a harp to play upon. Observing James they went and knelt down one on each side of him. "I don't know how to play," whispered Willard. "Nor I," said Tom. "Do as I do, make believe," returned James. "But let me tell you that when you've knelt here as long as I hav you'll wish you could stir around a little, if nothing more."

God raised his great right hand, and in a voice of thunder that shook the very heavens, said, "Where I should hear tuneful voices singing praises, I hear talking, which is blasphemy in heaven."

"There are men here in number three
Who hav never sung a praise to thee,
And they know not how to play,
know not how to play,
how to play,"

sang the group of angel kneelers.

"Send 'em to hell!" came again in thunder tones. "I wish I was going with you," said the door-tender, "for they hav jolly times there, and the devil isn't such a conceited, stuck-up fellow that he has to hav praises sung to him all the time." "Why, don't they burn there, and—" "No, bless your soul," interrupted the door-tender. "You see it is cold up here, terrible cold; too high up, I suppose. You know how it is when you take a balloon voyage, the higher up you go the colder it is. If they ever kept a fire here it would be some warmer. In hell they keep just enough to be comfortable, and the smell of the brimstone goes up chimney and inconveniences no one; and you can even sit down and hav a game of whist with each other or the young devils. It's awfully dull and monotonous here, but it is pleasant and jolly there. But you will hav to go, for there comes an old man and a young woman. Good day." "Good day."

They descended very rapidly. "Here we are," said Tom. "And there is the old devil himself," added Willard. "Hop on," said his satanic majesty, holding out his fork. "One at a time; I'm used to this business. The young ones will catch you all right and set you down by the fire, and I guess you will find it will feel comfortable, for your teeth are chattering and you are blue with cold. No wonder, either, with that thin dress on. Been up to heaven, I guess, and forgot to put your trousers on when you came away. Pretty cold place up there, and they don't dress warm enough. On good? All right, away you go." S. ATHENA MAGGOON.

Correspondence.

ATCHISON, KAN., July 2, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As several long months hav passed since I last wrote to the Corner, I will take advantage of the opportunity that is before me by presenting a few lines, to prove to the readers that I hav not "got religion," although I hav attended a revival meeting pretty regularly which has been in progress for some time, but I will say that the more I attend the less I become infatuated with these religious ideas, consequently making me believe more strongly that Freethought is the right and only religion. Should I hear that the friends of the Corner hav been thinking that I hav accepted the dogmas of superstition, on account of being so delinquent in writing, I should certainly feel it a most miserable insult.

One night of the revival the minister spoke in regard to the Freethinkers trying to get Christ out of the world, but he said before they could accomplish their act they would hav to destroy all the churches, and collect all the Bibles in the world and place them in a heap and set fire to them, and he wanted to know who would hav the courage to strike the match to them He had the impudence to say that he did not think Ingersoll would hav the courage to do such an act. It made me feel pretty warm, and I felt as though I would hav to get up and tell him that Ingersoll had the courage to do so, but was only too glad to hav the Bible in the world, as he proves by it that Freethought is the right religion; and not only that, but is using it as his bayonet in the battle between reason and superstition to wipe the churches of superstition out of existence, and to erect Freethought churches in their place.

But the fools can't see it in that way. They can't see why it is that Freethinkers keep Bibles in their homes, but, before we get through with them, we will hav their eyes pulled open so wide that they will not hav to use their spectacles to see why.

The preacher also advertised that he would giv a lecture on a certain evening for the special benefit of the young men of Atchison; so it aroused my curiosity to an extent that I went to hear him. On entering I found that his text was, "Against Bad Habits." Well, his sermon interested his Christian friends, but to me it was nothing, as Freethought advises me against them, and I hav taken its advice.

After the close of his sermon he told all that were Christians to arise; well, they all arose but me, consequently, after the meeting had adjourned, one of those soft-headed, long-legged religious young men came around and shook hands with me, and asked me if I stood up with the rest of them. I emphatically told him that I did not. Then he asked me why I did not arise. I said because I am not a Christian. Then, for curiosity's sake, he asked me why I was not a Chistian. Then I further aroused his curiosity by telling him that I did not think that the Bible was inspired; that it was not the word of an infinitly wise and benevolent God. And I told him that I thought I was just as good as he was, and a great deal better than half the Christian young men that were present. "Well," he said, "you may hav reasons to think so." I told him that I had reasons to know, without thinking anything about it, but as he did not ask for my reasons, I did not state them. So we parted; he taking his old road to the fossil's niche of faith, and I the path of truth and justice. As ever,

Your Liberal friend,
JOHN J. I. REMSBURG.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

The author has not chosen a commonplace subject, but has gone into a comparativly unoccupied field. About fifty years ago "Corbett's Advice to Young Men" obtained a larger circulation than any work of that day, although parents cautiously placed it in the way of their children to be slyly read, because the subjects treated were not, as now, matters of common confidence between parents and children. But it taught what parents wanted their grown children to know—the ways of right living. Miss Wixon has hit the mark in her aim, and we predict great success for her new work.—Hanford (Cal.) Journal.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. By Susan H. Wixon. Truth Seeker Co., New York. Price 10 cents.

We hav received a thirty-four page pamphlet under the above caption from the pen of our esteemed friend and coreligionist, Miss Susan H. Wixon, the editor of the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The brochure is a lecture delivered at the International Congress of Freethinkers, Chicago, October, 1893. Miss Wixon wields a facil pen, and her subject is well chosen. She puts forward with clearness the wrongs which woman suffered and still suffers at the hands of Christianity.

Miss Wixon is one of the foremost female Freethought advocates in the United States, and anything from her pen is sure to be one more nail driven into the coffin of Christianity.—Progress, Trinidad, West Indies.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN? By John E. Remsburg. The Truth Seeker Co., New York. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian? The martyred President has been dead less than thirty years, and here is a book written by Mr. John E. Remsburg presenting the most violently diverse and antagonistic opinions upon this point The writer has made a very close study of all the accessible testimony bearing upon this point, and the result is another illustration of the difficulty of writing human history. Mr. Lincoln was assassinated on the 15th of April, 1865, and the same year Dr. J. G. Holland published his "Life of Lincoln." In this he makes use of these words: "Moderate, frank, truthful, forgiving, loving, just, Mr. Lincoln will always be remembered as eminently a Christian President, and the almost immeasurably great results which he had the privilege of achieving were due to the fact that he was a Christian President." Dr. Holland's testimony seems to hav been based upon a conversation Mr. Lincoln had in 1860 with Hon. Newton Bateman, of Illinois. In the course of the conversation it is affirmed that Mr. Lincoln said: "I know there is a God and that he hates injustice and slavery. I see the storm coming and I know his hand is in it If he has a place for me—and I think he has—I believe I am ready. I am nothing, but truth is everything. I know I am right, for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God." In 1872 Lamar's "Life of Lincoln" contains statements which tend to dispute the testimonies of Dr. Holland and Bateman. Then the Rev. Dr. Reed, of Springfield, attempts to sustain the testimony of Dr. Holland, calling to the witness-stand the Rev. Drs. Smith, Sunderland, Miner, and Gurley. The evidence they giv all tends to show that Mr. Lincoln had been converted from his early "Infidelity" and accepted the orthodox view of Christianity. One witness says that "Mr. Lincoln was at heart a Christian man, believed in the Savior, and was seriously considering the steps which would formally connect him with the visible church on earth." Dr. Miner, after a long conversation with Mr. Lincoln, "felt certain" that if he was "not really an experimental Christian, he was acting like one." Dr. Gurley affirmed that Mr. Lincoln said to him that he had lost confidence in everything but God, and that he now believed his heart was changed, and that he loved the Savior, and if he was not deceived in himself, it was his intention soon to make a profession of religion." Hon. Isaac N. Arnold published his "Life of Lincoln" in 1885. He says: "No more reverent Christian than he ever sat in the executiv chair, not excepting Washington. . . . It is not claimed that he was orthodox. For creeds and dogmas he cared little. But in the great fundamental principles of religion, of the Christian religion, he was a firm believer." Rev. Mr. Willets, of Brooklyn, tells of an interview which Mr. Lincoln had with a very devout lady who lived in Washington. The President, it is asserted, asked the lady for her opinion respecting the nature of a true religious experience. The lady said that, in her judgment, it consisted of a true conviction of one's own sinfulness and weakness, and personal need of a Savior for strength and support; that views of mere doctrin might and would differ, but when one was really brought to feel his need of divine help and seek the aid of the Holy Spirit for strength and guidance, it was satisfactory evidence of his having been born again. Mr. Lincoln replied: "If what you hav told me is really a correct view of this great subject. I think I can say with sincerity that I hope I am a Christian." In the "Lincoln Memorial Album," Mr. Lincoln is reported as having said to said to an "Illinois clergyman:" "When I went to Gettysburg and saw the graves of thousands of our soldiers, I then and there consecrated myself to Christ. Yes, I do love Jesus." Rev. Dr. John H. Barrows givs his testimony to the same effect. Rev. Dr. Francis Vinton, of New York, claims to hav converted Mr. Lincoln to the "Christian doctrin of the resurrection and the immortality of the soul." Mr. Remsburg analyzes this mass of testimony in a very admirable and logical fashion. He shows from the testimony of Mrs. Lincoln, Mr. Hay, Judge Davis, Mr. Lamar, and Mr. Herndon, those people who had lived in the closest intimacy with the great President, that the statements made by the witnesses to Lincoln's orthodoxy cannot in the nature of things be true. Perhaps the most valuable and trustworthy evidence is that offered by Mr. Wm. Herndon, one of Lincoln's biographers. He was the President's law partner for more than twenty years, and evidently enjoyed his fullest confidence. Mr. Herndon says: "From what I know of Mr. Lincoln, and from what I hav heard and verily believe, I can say, first, that he did not believe in a special creation, his idea being that all creation was an evolution under law; secondly, that he did not believe that the Bible was a special revelation from God, as the Christian world contends; thirdly, he did not believe in miracles as understood by Christians; fourthly, he believed in universal inspiration and miracles under law; fifthly, he did not believe that Jesus was the Christ, the son of God, as the Christian church contends; sixthly, he believed that all things, both matter and mind, were governed by laws, universal, absolute, and eternal. Law was to Lincoln everything, and special interferences shams and delusions." Mr. Remsburg is very severe and denunciatory of some of the clerical defenders of Lincoln's orthodoxy, even going to the length of calling them absolute falsifiers. But such extreme denunciation is probably not justified by the facts. Very few men ever deliberately falsify in matters of this kind. The fundamental mistake which is apt to be made by orthodox people is in supposing that when men talk of Christianity they must mean their type of Christianity. Theodore Parker claimed to believe in the Christian religion, although he held every one of the convictions which Herndon attributes to Lincoln. There is a loose way of talking about Christianity into which Mr. Lincoln may hav unconsciously fallen, and those zealous and intensely orthodox gentlemen who were anxious to enroll the great President among their number may hav, quite innocently, biased and discolored Mr. Lincoln's words to fit their own ideas.—Rev. John Snyder in St. Louis Globe Democrat.

Gems of Thought.

THE person who is not proud of his own work never takes much interest in it.—Galveston News.

You speak of coöperation. The big individual is the best coöperator. He brings a giant force to the pull. He meets every event with deed, and to him all time is daybreak.—Horace L. Traubel.

MAN is completely turned around. His Eden is in the past, and so of course he thinks he must look that way for example and guidance. And this all comes from that one false notion that man was, but is not! instead of recognizing the fact that man was not, but is, and is to be!—F. D. Cummings.

Do you get away from the individual? Do you escape him? How but by destroying him? And in destroying him you destroy the society about whose safety you profess to be concerned. Crown the individual and he will bring to the social board the fruit of a kingdom. Beggar that individual and he will stand at your feast, an eternal specter and reproach.—Horace L. Traubel.

RELIGION itself means intolerance. The various sects tolerate nothing but their own dogmas. The priests call themselvs shepherds. The passiv they drive into their folds. When they hav folded you then they are satisfied, they know you fear them; if you stand aloof, they fear you. Those who resist they consider as wolves, and, where they hav the power, stone them to death.—Percy Bysshe Shelley.

SCARCELY any connection exists between morality and the disciplin of ordinary teaching. Mere culture of the intellect (and education as usually conducted amounts to little more) is hardly at all operativ upon conduct. Creeds pasted upon the mind, good principles learned by rote, lessons in right and wrong, will not eradicate vicious propensities; though people, in spite of their experience as parents and as citizens, persist in hoping they will. —Herbert Spencer.

EVERY advance in science, every improvement in the command of the mechanical forces of nature, every step in political or social freedom, has risen in the first instance from an act of skepticism, from an uncertainty whether the formulas, or the opinions, or the government, or the received practical theories were absolutely perfect, or whether beyond the circle of received truths there might not lie something broader, deeper, truer, and thus better deserving the acceptance of mankind.—James Anthony Froude.

THE Bible states that God created all things in six days. No scientist believes this. Astronomy opens up vistas of time which baffle the longest sight. Nature works slowly and gradually, though surely, and a million years are as nothing in her infinit processes. Nor does science recognize the order of creation as given in Genesis. The Bible says that light existed three days before its source, and that the earth revolved three days before the attractiv power of the sun began to operate, or, in other words, that the effect existed three days before the cause It says that fish and fowl were created together, when geology shows us that the earliest fish lived millions of years before the earliest fowl. —George W. Foote.

A MAN believes in the immaculate conception. He denies, then, that a certain event took place in accordance with laws exemplified in all similar cases. He impugns, in this instance, the validity of that inductiv process upon which he counts at every step in every-day life. He is a scientific skeptic in the strictest sense, for he is throwing doubt upon the trustworthiness of one of the primary ratiocinativ processes The same is true, whenever an event admitted by all parties to hav occurred is ascribed by one party to supernatural interference. An amiable apologist expressed his surprise the other day that men of science should take into account such trifles as the existence of flint implements, and refuse to take into account the existence of the Bible and Christianity. Surely he never heard of the man of science who denied the existence of the Bible and Christianity. Which man really declines "to take a fact into account"- the man who declares it to be altogether exceptional and supernatural, or the man who regards it as a result of the normal operation of recognized forces—which implies the greatest "skepticism"—the assertion that somebody wrote the book of Genesis by faculties similar to those which enabled another to write Homer, or the assertion that it was utterly impossible that anybody would hav written down the legends of the garden of Eden and the ark without the direct assistance of God Almighty? If it is skeptical to deny one agency, it is equally skeptical to deny the other. What is given to Jehovah is taken from Moses.—Leslie Stephen.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny; a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

By Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B.

CONTENTS:

BOOK I.—PLEASURE: Chap. I.—Sources of Pleasure. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures. Chap IV.—Social Pleasures. Chap. V.—Pleasures of the Savage, the Barbarian and the Civilized. Chap. VI.—Genesis of religions. Chap. VII.—Christianity.

III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject without much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the use, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for is bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

SENATOR QUAY'S desire for a national Sunday law probably springs from his knowledge of how much devilment he can practice six days in the week.—Oakland Times.

SOME people oppose all divorces, we know,
And the death of the statute await;
But there is a kind of divorce that should go;
It is that of the church and the state.

DEALER in birds: "So, Dr. Sunday, you want a parrot?" Rev. Dr. Sunday: "Such is my present quest. I am greatly captivated by the amazing intelligence of the feathered creatures." Dealer: "Well, here's a very intelligent bird." Rev. Dr. Sunday: "Ah, indeed (to the bird). Polly want a cracker?" Polly: "To hell with crackers. Gimme a whisky sour, and hav it strong."—Ex.

IN a local church meeting one of the deacons suggested that an entertainment of some kind be given for the purpose of raising enough money to clear off the church debt. "How much is it?" asked a member. "Only $200." "And what was it for?" asked the interested pewholder. "Why," said the deacon, "it was for flowers and decorations used in celebrating the church being at last freed from debt."—Oakland, Cal., Saturday Press.

FOREIGNER (traveling in America): "Porter, can you get me a pack of cards?" Porter: "Yes sah (brings them). Seventy-five cents, sah." Traveler (paying and tearing open the covers): "I want a table, too." Porter: "Yes sah (fits one and pockets a fee for the service). Thank you, sah." Traveler shuffles cards and deals out for soltaire. Porter (retires to end of car for five minutes, then returns): "Scuse me sah. Cards are not allowed to be played on dis coach on Sundays, sah."

THE South Melbourne Presbytery has adopted a resolution by which it is intended to "set apart women of approved character and ability to assist in the spiritual and temporal oversight of families." This opens up a wide field for speculativ Paul Pryism. Already, tenders hav been called for a supply of gimlets, augers, light ladders, and night-glasses. "To the prurient, all things are prurient," but it would be a shocking disaster should some nervous citizen mistake these earnest reformers for the dreaded burgling night prowler, and empty the contents of his revolver into the sacred person of "approved character!"—Melbourne Liberator.

THE DEATH OF THE DEVIL.

For the miracle that I'll retrace
Quickly as the sketcher paints,
Glory be to the Saint Ignace,
Patron of all our little saints.
By a trick which really would seem most
Infernal if ever saints misled,
He has made the devil giv up the ghost;
The devil is dead, the devil is dead.

Satan found him going to dine;
Drink, or own yourself second best;
Done! but he poured in the devil's wine
A powerful poison potently blest.
Satan drinks, comes the colic quick;
He swears, he writhes, he dashes his head
At last he bursts like a heretic:
The devil is dead, the devil is dead.

He is dead! the monks all cry,
None will purchase another agnus:
He is dead! the canons sigh,
Who will pay now for an oremus!
The conclave shook in mortal fear,
Power and strong-box, adieu! they said,
We hav lost our father dear:
The devil is dead, the devil is dead.

Love won't serve us as fear of old
Whose gifts hav overfilled our hands;
Intolerance is almost cold,
Who will kindle again its brands!
If man escapes us, slips our rope,
Truth will begin to lift her head,
God will be greater than the pope:
The devil is dead, the devil is dead.

Ignatius runs to them with the cry,
Giv me, giv me his place and power;
No one was frightened of him, but I—
I will make even the monarchs cower;
Robberies, massacres, plagues, or wars
Everywhere, oh, I'll flourish, he said;
God may hav what I fling out of doors;
The devil is dead, the devil is dead.

Ah! brave homme! cried all the court,
We bless thee in thy malice and hate;
And at once his order, Rome's support,
Saw its robe flutter at heaven's gate.
From the angels' tears of pity fell;
Poor man will hav cause to sue, they said,
Saint Ignatius inherits hell—
The devil is dead, the devil is dead.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. DAN SEETH A WONDERFUL BILLY GOAT.

And as I was considering, behold, an he goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran into him in the fury of his power.—Dan. viii. 5, 6.

THE Senate Committee on Territories has reported favorably on the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as states.

AT a fire in Washington, D. C., on July 25th three firemen were crushed to death and two hundred draught horses burned.

THE Republicans of Wisconsin hav nominated William H. Upham for governor. The nomination is said to please the A. P. A.

THE A. R. U. strike leaders are out on bail and their cases hav gone over to September, owing to the illness of government attorney Edwin Walker.

MENIUER, the Anarchist, on trial for blowing up the Café Véry in the spring of 1892, has been found guilty and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

DENGUE fever has broken out in the detachment of the Third Artillery stationed at Key West. There hav been 55 cases in the garrison of 115. No deaths.

A. W. CARPENTER, editor of the Vindicator, organ of the Populists of southwest Texas, was shot and killed by Populist Sheriff Walter Durbin on July 22d.

THE attempted investigation of the charges of corruption against the officials of the Kansas penitentiary at Leavenworth led to a fight between Warden Chase and Judge McDonnell.

THE war between China and Japan has been opened by Japanese victories on the sea, several Chinese transports loaded with troops being sunk, while the Chinese warships sailed away.

THE business part of Belle Plaine, Iowa, was destroyed by fire on July 28th. Among the property burned was the hardware store of that prince of Liberals, Charles P. Hosmer.

IN the tariff Cleveland-Gorman imbroglio every Democratic paper in the country stands by the president. Gorman has the support of the more partisan of the Republican papers and of the New York Sun.

THE Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen for the district between and including Boston and Troy will expel all members who participated in the late sympathetic strike, Rule 10 of that organization forbidding such strikes.

THE assassination of President Carnot and the commission of other crimes has led to the adoption by the French Chamber of Deputies of a most drastic anti-Anarchist law. It may lead to a reaction against the government.

CAPTAIN DOHERTY and wardmen Hock and Meehan of the New York police force, who were tried before the commissioners for receiving money from keepers of disorderly houses for "protection," were found guilty and dismissed from the force.

THE commission appointed by President Cleveland, under the law of 1888, to investigate the A. R. U. strike, consists of Carroll D. Wright, commissioner of labor, —— Kernan, of New York, and Judge N. E. Worthington, of Peoria, Ill.

AFTER several days of caustic debate in the Senate, in which Gorman, Smith, and Vest sharply attacked the president, and Hill, Vilas, Caffery, and Daniels defended him, the tariff bill was sent back to the conference committee without instructions.

NIKOLAI M. YADRINTSEF, the well-known Russian author and publicist, has just died at Barnaul. He was the founder and editor of the Eastern Review, and was considered the best-infor medman in the world in regard to the history, archæology, and anthropology of Asiatic Russia.

THE new Russian settlements on the Zerafshan River in Asia hav, with the special favors granted to Sarmacand, which is under Russian control, so reduced the water supply that Bokhara seemed doomed to extinction. Now a canal is to be dug from the Oxus to Bokhara. It will be one of the great industrial achievements of the century.

A MOB attacked a flock of sheep near Meeker, Colorado, on July 25th, and, after tying Gen. S. Allzbrook and a deputy sheriff who had them in charge, stabbed, clubbed, and shot to death about 250 of the sheep. Then they went to Smith & Timmer's camp and killed 101 blooded rams. This is one of the periodical skirmishes in the chronic war between the sheep-raisers and the small rauchmen of the West.

NORTHERN Wisconsin has been swept by the worst forest fires in the history of the state. Several towns within a radius of one hundred miles of Ashland hav been partially or wholly destroyed. These include Phillips, Prentice, Mason, and Shore's Crossing. Many lives were lost, including sixteen on a raft upon which people were trying to escape from Phillips. Many railroad bridges and other railroad property destroyed. Relief is being rushed to the sufferers. Governor Peck went to Phillips to take charge of the work of succor.

THERE is a severe drought in several of the Western states. Last week a "hot wave" aggravated the trouble, and on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday New York was scorched almost beyond precedent. The government thermometer observations, taken at quite an altitude, giv no adequate idea of the temperature at the street level. In New York and Brooklyn ten persons were killed and many others prostrated by the heat on Sunday. Central Park was practically deserted, while hundreds of thousands went to the more distant parks, where they could get on the grass, and to the seashore.

WEARING AWAY THE FOUNDATION.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies will soon adjourn, but the people of the country will remain in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the fund and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

Mr. Putnam reports good comradeship among the islands of the north. There seems to be a natural sympathy between Freethought and frontier civilization, probably owing to the lack of the conservatism and bigotry which paralyze thought where stupidity is strong enough to support the church. Meanwhile we are still receiving orders for Mr. Putnam's great book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which goes with THE TRUTH SEEKER one year for $6.50. Since last acknowledgment, the following hav taken advantage of this offer: Alex DeLong and James Davidson, Montana; Dr. R. C. Lacey, Texas; Z. W. Tinker, Pennsylvania; Wm. McIlvain, New York.

The following sums hav been received at this office, to be applied to the defense of Mr. J. B. Wise: M. M. Murray, $10; Henry Schmidt, $1; John Helm, $5.

Is the Bible Under the Ban of the Laws of the United States?

It has several times happened that officials and special agents who were themselvs Christians hav endeavored to punish Liberals for sending extracts from the Bible through the mails. This was attempted under what are popularly known as the Comstock postal statutes, or, less ambiguously, the Obscene Literature law.

Among those thus attacked was George Francis Train. He published certain Bible passages, without comment. He was thrown into the prison known as the Tombs, New York city, but was never brought to trial. It would appear that his persecutors became ashamed of their accusations against God's infallible word, for they wanted to release Mr. Train without a trial. He, however, would not be a party to any such arrangement, refusing to leave the prison until tried and discharged. But his pious enemies would not meet the issue squarely. At last an order came from Albany to take down the Tombs prison, which was very unhealthful. This, of course, necessitated the removal of the prisoners, and Mr. Train could no longer refuse to leave. Having thus gotten him off their hands by a dishonest ruse, the prison was not touched. He had been immured six months on a charge which his accusers did not dare press, lest they should damage the Bible, all this time denied his constitutional right to a speedy trial by a jury of his peers. It was an outrage reflecting infinit discredit on all who were concerned in the cowardly attempt to strike down the liberty of the press and mails and render of no value the most precious guarantees of citizen rights. Mr. Train's right to send a part of the Bible through the mails was assuredly not less than that of the Bible societies to send the book as a whole.

If the Christians regard the Bible as obscene, why do they continue to circulate it by the millions of copies, and put it into the hands of children in homes, Bible classes, Sunday schools, Epworth Leagues, Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor, and the common schools? If it is not obscene, why do they prosecute Freethinkers who transmit through the mails ungarbled excerpts from it? If it be said that the book cannot fairly be judged by isolated passages, that its general character must be taken into consideration, and that the intent of the writers and disseminators plays a very important part in determining the legal status of the work, we reply that the reasoning is sound, but we ask at once why the publications of Freethinkers and physiologists, prosecuted under the same statutes, are not given the benefit of these facts and arguments? To illustrate: Take "Cupid's Yokes," the pamphlet which caused the imprisonment of Mr. D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and of its author, Mr. E. H. Heywood, and what were the rulings of the judges who presided at the trials of these earnest reformers? The indictments were based upon a few short, scattered passages in the pamphlet, and it was held that these, being found, in the opinion of judge and jury, within the inhibition of the statute, were sufficient to convict the defendants and subject them to the very severe penalties of the law. It was plain that the general character of the pamphlet was not such as to bring it within the purview of the statute against obscene literature, for the language in which it was couched was unobjectionable even to the prosecutors, except in the few places covered by the specifications of the indictments, and it was undoubtedly an earnest protest against all forms of prostitution and other censurable sexual relations. But all this availed nothing; the pamphlet, as a whole, must be relegated, in the estimation of the uncritical public, to the limbo of obscene literature because of the strained interpretation put upon a few lines by judges and juries.

Neither were the manifestly good intentions of the author any shield for himself or Mr. Bennett. No reasonable, fair-minded reader of "Cupid's Yokes" could help seeing that Mr. Heywood meant well, whatever might be thought of his style, his methods, or his ideals of social life. He did not intend to corrupt, he did not intend to diminish the sum total of health, honor, and happiness; he did not intend to destroy anything which he regarded as good and helpful to men and women. It was in vain that Messrs. Bennett and Heywood and their counsel sought to impress these truths upon the minds of the jurymen. The general character of the book went for nothing; the self-evidently good intentions of the writer had no weight, the accused were railroaded to prison because judges and jurors thought they had found something obscene in a few plain words in half a dozen or so short passages. So judged, what would become of the Bible and its circulators?

Neither Mr. Bennett nor Mr. Heywood was permitted on his trial to show by the testimony of reputable publishers and book dealers that "Cupid's Yokes" was circulating in the regular channels of trade, and consequently could not be assumed to belong in the class of unquestionably interdicted literature. They were not permitted to call in evidence literary experts, although expert testimony is readily admitted in all other trials; they were not permitted to show their juries that the Bible, that Shakspere, that Byron, that Smollett, and scores of other classics contained matter fully as open to the charge of obscenity, to state it very mildly, as anything in the little work of the Princeton agitator. If the Bible were to be judged by the same rules of evidence that Judges Benedict and Clark insisted upon enforcing when D. M. Bennett and E. H. Heywood were on trial, what jury could avoid declaring it in offense under the obscenity statutes, and bringing in a verdict of guilty against whomsoever should be found to hav deposited a copy of it for mailing?

When Mr. Moses Harman was given a sentence of five years in the penitentiary for sending through the mails a copy of his paper containing the "Markland Letter," he was, in fact, punished for just one word, a Latin physiological name, which is found in all standard medical books and journals where the anatomy of the human reproductiv functions is described or its pathology explained. No sensible person could claim that the article which contained the scientific term was, on the whole, calculated to promote vice or encourage the invasion of the weak by the strong, and that Mr. Markland's intention was to induce a greater respect for the person and rights of woman was clearly shown in every line of his righteously-indignant exposure and condemnation of a foul wrong. But because he was so imprudent as to make use of a physiological term which vulgar minds hav stained with their own pruriency, his letter was pounced upon by the agents of a society which terrorizes the writers and publishers of the country and helps keep the people ignorant in regard to matters concerning which they most need information. Arrest the Secretary of the American Bible Society for mailing a copy of the Bible, and a hundred passages in the "sacred" volume could be cited, any one of which would send him to prison for the longest term allowed by the obscenity law if the same rules of evidence were enforced against him that were used to crush Moses

Harman when he was tried for mailing the "Markland Letter."

Of course there are Christians who attempt to save their fetich by asserting that there is nothing in the Bible which properly can be called obscene. We are treated to dissertations on the "honest bluntness" of the Old Testament writers, and are told that they are "frank," "candid," and "plain," and call "a spade a spade." They did not think of impurity, did not intend to demoralize, we are assured. But cannot the same truthfully be said for "Cupid's Yokes," Trall's "Sexual Physiology," "Marsupial Animals," "The Markland Letter," and for the writers of these books, pamphlets, and letters? Where is the obscenity—in intent or in fact—in any of these works, when measured by the same standard that the Christian defenders of the Bible wish to apply to the phraseology of that book? If Heywood, Bennett, and Harman were justly convicted, not another copy of the Bible should be permitted to befoul the mail bags of the United States.

THE CASE OF J. B. WISE—ITS HISTORY.

Mr. J. B. Wise resides at Clay Center, Kansas. He is a man past middle life and carries an empty sleeve. Although a stanch Freethinker, he has the respect of the Christian people of the community. When not engaged in other useful labor, he travels about the country selling Liberal and scientific books and soliciting subscriptions for Freethought papers. In this way he adds a little to his very scanty income, and helps bring nearer the time when such outrages as that we are about to describe will no longer be possible in this land that should be free. His canvassing work brought Mr. Wise into contact first and then into conflict with an orthodox minister stationed at Industry, Kansas. This man's name is H. B. Vennum. He is described as of great stature and abundant girth, overbearing and dictatorial in his manners, much inclined to substitute denunciation for argument, and, as the event has proved, perfectly willing to invoke the mighty power of the nation to help him crush a poor and crippled antagonist whose offense consists in calling the attention of the divine to a certain passage of "holy" scripture. A more unmanly act than this of Rev. Mr. Vennum's it would be difficult to imagine. The two men had got into a discussion regarding the Bible and were carrying it on by means of letters and postal cards. In answer to some assertion made by the preacher, Mr. Wise copied on a postal card the twelfth verse of the thirty-sixth chapter of Isaiah, and sent it to the reverend gentleman who pretends to believe that it is his duty, when smitten on one cheek, to turn the other for another blow. He had received no physical wound, and so had no occasion to appeal to the law for vengeance, even if he has found a way to excuse himself to his own conscience for not obeying the non-resistant commands of his "master" when he is personally assaulted, if ever. He claims to be fighting the battles of the Lord with the sword of the spirit. Mr. Wise had not been able to reconcile the claims made for the Bible as a divinely inspired book with the internal evidence which it furnishes that it is the production of men neither intellectually infallible nor morally perfect. Mr. Vennum, vaunting himself as a gentleman of education and refinement, had no business to resort to physical force, legal or extra-legal, so long as his Freethought antagonist made use of mental and moral weapons only in attack and defense. Even had Mr. Wise assailed Mr. Vennum with his one hand or slandered him with his tongue, the latter, as a Christian and a minister, would not have been justified in retaliating either with his fists or through the law. If he is a consistent follower of the man whom he claims as God and accepts as his leader, he cannot return evil for evil, nor even ask back the garment stolen from him. On the other hand, dismissing the teachings of Jesus and Mr. Vennum's positive assertions that he accepts them as the very oracles of God, and stepping on to a purely human plane of motive and action, we are still unable to find even the shadow of an excuse for the dastardly conduct of this minister. He has not been in any way injured in his person; he has not been despoiled of his property or any portion of it; he has not been slandered by the utterances of old Mr. Wise, nor has he been libeled by the card which that gentleman mailed to him. He had no claims for damages. He had no decent reason to desire revenge.

Let us reverse the positions of the Christian priest and the crippled Freethinker. Let us suppose that, in the course of a discussion of the merits of the writings of Voltaire, Mr. Vennum had transcribed on a postal card a passage from one of the works of the great French Infidel. Then suppose further (which we admit puts a hard strain on the imaginative faculty) that Mr. Wise had lost his temper and caused the arrest of Mr. Vennum under some unconstitutional law of the United States, thus subjecting him to inconvenience, ignominy, serious expense, imprisonment in jail pending the procurement of bail, indictment, trial, and possible incarceration in the penitentiary, which would carry with it the probable destruction of his business and not unlikely the undermining of his health and his premature death. What would be said of Mr. Wise under such circumstances? Would not the Christian brethren of Mr. Vennum call the Infidel a coward and a scoundrel? Would they not say, and truly, that his villainous attack upon the clergyman was a confession that he did not dare attempt the defense of Voltaire's works with the weapons of reason and honest, fair examination? And what Freethinker who respected himself would stand by Mr. Wise in a fight so inaugurated? But the comparison is a feeble one, for Mr. Wise does not believe that Voltaire was inspired; he does not believe that he was morally without fault; he does not believe that his intellect was unlimited in its capacity to acquire knowledge and communicate it to his fellows. Mr. Vennum does believe—at least he says so—that the Bible is God's revelation to man, inerrant and without stain of immoral teaching. And yet he solemnly declares that Mr. Wise is amenable to the laws of the United States against obscene literature because he deposited for transmission through the mails a postal card upon which was written an extract from the Bible—only this and nothing more! In the name of all the saints of all the churches, what a confession! How many honest, sensible Christians will defend and sustain Mr. Vennum in this miserable attack upon the one-armed Freethinker?

As we wish to giv in this issue a full statement regarding the persecution of Mr. Wise, so far as it has developed itself, that the editors of the country may comment intelligently upon it, we reproduce some letters, etc., that have appeared in previous numbers.

The first intimation of Mr. Wise's trouble that reached the Freethinkers of the East was the information contained in this letter:

"CLAY CENTER, KAN., June 26, 1894.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find a letter from J. B. Wise, with whom you are more or less acquainted, as he is the distributor of Freethought literature in these parts. For some time he carried on a correspondence by letter with the Rev. Vennum. Each was trying to convert the other, and of course quoted scripture. I have read one or two of Vennum's letters, and advised Mr. Wise to quit, as it was doing no good; he promised to do so, but wound up by quoting the twelfth verse of the thirty-sixth chapter of Isaiah on a postal card, without comment. The reason he used a card was that, being very poor, a cripple with only one arm; also crippled in his chances of making a living because he is a Liberal, he at the time was out of funds; no stamps or stationery, but happening to hav a postal card, he used it, thinking no harm. Now about two months ago a postal inspector came to my place, where Wise happened to be that day, and asked if he wrote the card. 'Yes,' replied Wise, and the inspector asked the reason why. He was told and then left. We thought the matter had dropped, hearing no more of it for so long a time. But about the 22d of this month Wise disappeared, and by accident I heard about it three or four days afterward, but could not find out where he was until I heard from Sheriff Neeley, of Topeka, and Sheriff Rothenberger, of Leavenworth, having previously written to them. Mr. Wise's letter will explain the rest. I am now going to try to bail him out if it is possible for me to do so.

"GEORGE HARRISON."

Accompanying the letter from Mr. Harrison was one from Mr. Wise himself, in which he wrote, among other things:

"LEAVENWORTH, KAN., June 24, 1894.

"MR. HARRISON, Dear Friend: Your kind and welcome letter received to-day. I was promised a speedy hearing by the United States marshal from Topeka (the man who brought me to this place), but as yet I hav had not even a hearing, and it seems I can get no satisfaction from anyone—not even the United States Marshal Neeley or the United States District Attorney Perry—and what to do I do not know. This I do know: I am now in the Leavenworth jail and have been ever since Saturday noon, June 16th, and have spent half of that time in a locked cell, which is anything but pleasant, especially this hot weather. I wrote day before yesterday to friend Tebbe in regard to my case, as I could get no hearing and no satisfaction whatever in regard to it, and that I would like very much indeed if it suited him to come and see about it. I was going to come to see you before the United States marshal and I started from Clay Center, but I did not have time, as I had to start with him directly after he had me arrested, in order to take the evening freight train east. Your true friend,

"J. B. WISE,

"Leavenworth, Kan. (Care of Sheriff.)"

The National Defense Association and THE TRUTH SEEKER immediately interested themselves in the case, and the Freethinkers of the country were soon made acquainted with all the circumstances then known to us and to Mr. J. E. Remsburg. Counsel was retained, a call for defense funds made, and prompt steps taken to obtain bail for this victim of a clergymen beaten in argument and ashamed of his Bible. Mr. Wise obtained a bondsman two weeks before he was released. We will let him tell the story himself. In a letter dated at Clay Center, July 16th, he says:

"I was confined just four weeks last Saturday noon, July 14th, at which time I was released on a bond of $300 furnished by my Liberal friend, George Harrison, of Clay Center, Kan. My bond was given almost two weeks before I left jail, but I could not get any one to release me. United States Marshal Neeley of Leavenworth was the proper one to do that, but for the last four weeks he was away from home most of the time looking after the strikers, and for that reason I was not released. Therefore I spent just four weeks in jail, coming home last Saturday evening, July 14th.

"The court will convene October 8, 1894, at which time I will have to make my appearance. . . . I intend to go around in the meantime among my Liberal friends in this community and see whether they will assist me to secure a lawyer. What I want is an able lawyer, and one that will not charge too much. As you are aware, I am a very poor man financially, and hav to depend on my friends almost entirely if I secure a lawyer at all. If not, I will hav to depend on the state to provide me with counsel. I hope all the Freethought papers throughout the United States will hav something to say about my case and shame the Christians so that they will go to work and investigate the Bible thoroughly and see for themselvs what that Bible really is."

It is a shame that any man, who must be assumed to be innocent until adjudged guilty, should be compelled to remain in prison weeks after his bonds have been signed and approved. The federal courts are badly managed, persons charged with crime being often kept in prison for many months, sometimes for a year or more, before they are granted the "speedy" trial to which they are entitled by the Constitution. Mr. Wise is certainly justified in feeling that he has been badly treated by the officials and he should receive heavy damages for those two weeks of imprisonment to which he was subjected through no fault of his own. Whoever is responsible should pay for this flagrant neglect of duty.

Can Mr. Wise be convicted of violation of the national obscenity statutes? Was the mailing of the postal card on which he had written the verse from the Bible a contravention of the law? Will the courts hold the Bible, or any part of it, to be obscene? Of course it is impossible to forecast the decision of a court, but it does not seem possible that any judge and jury will declare that the defendant in this case is guilty. If they do, such decision will shut the Bible out of the mails and put it fairly upon a level with other books. This would be a substantial victory for equal rights and would do much to open the eyes of the people to the actual composition of the Bible and to the evils that are inevitable under the national obscenity statutes. But if Mr. Wise is acquitted it will show that there is not one law for the Bible and for Freethought and scientific works. It will reveal in a still stronger light the real motives of Comstock and his confrères in securing the enactment of the law, which motives Comstock partially betrayed to the public gaze when he boasted of the Liberal and radical literature which his society was going to "stamp out." In another view of the matter, the release of Mr. Wise would be a victory for fair play, for it would show that Freethinkers have equal rights with Christians in the dissemination of the Bible or parts thereof. On the other hand, it would emphasize the fact that the Bible is by law a privileged book. So, however we look at this prosecution and whatever its outcome, we see that Bible idolatry will be weakened, the one-sided and unconstitutional obscenity statutes discredited, and some more brains made receptive to the truth that the mail system was designed for the use of all the people, not to enforce any coterie's standard of good taste in literature and art.

Why we are inclined to believe that Mr. Wise will escape conviction will appear in what immediately follows. In April, 1891, Mr. B. C. Murray, editor of the Sunday Gazetteer of Denison, Texas, wrote a long letter to the postmaster of that city, telling him that he had a book (the Bible) which he wished to send through the mails and calling the official's attention to the statutes against transmitting obscene literature by post, and also to Postmaster-General Wanamaker's report for the fiscal year ending June 30th, quoting from the statutes and the report. Mr. Murray next called the postmaster's attention to a large number of passages in the Bible and closed his letter by asking if he could send by mail a book containing such matter. Mr. Dougherty, the postmaster, wrote at once to the department at Washington, stating the question, and this reply was promptly forthcoming:

"OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
"FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
"April 24, 1891.

"C. T. DOUGHERTY, Postmaster, Denison, Tex.:

"Sir: In your letter of the 18th inst. you stated that Mr. B. C. Murray 'is anxious for a ruling from the department on the question he raises,' in a certain communication of his bearing date of the 17th inst., which was transmitted with your letter.

"The question that Mr. Murray raises is as to the mailability of the volume entitled 'Holy Bible.' I find no other question involved in his communication, and I think I do not misunderstand the full scope of the question, for he says: 'I have a book which I would like to have transmitted through the mails; but before mailing the same, I wish to be sure that, in doing so, I would not be violating the act of Congress passed March 3, 1873, and amended July 12, 1876.'

"If Mr. Murray should offer the Holy Bible for mailing, you can receive and deliver it at your office, or transmit it in the mails; for it is not believed in this department to come within the prohibitory clauses of the act referred to. The penalty portions of said statute are enforcible by the courts, and the question of his liability thereunder is a proper one to be submitted to the United States attorney.

"You may assure Mr. Murray that the mailability of the volume will not be questioned by the post-office department or by any postmaster.

"The volume sent with your communication is herein returned. Very respectfully, JAMES M. TYNER,
"Assistant Attorney-General."

At about the same time, Mr. M. W. St. John, living near Cedar Falls, Iowa, left a copy of the "Holy Bible Abridged" with Postmaster Humbert of that city, with the request that he send it to the postmaster general in order to ascertain if it was mailable. This is the reply received from Mr. Tyner:

"OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
"WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1891.

"S. B HUMBERT, Postmaster, Cedar Falls, Ia.:

"Sir: With your letter of the 7th inst., addressed to the postmaster-general (which has been sent to me for reply), you submit a volume entitled 'The Holy Bible' (abridged), and inquire if your opinion that it is unmailable under the provisions of Section 380 Postal Laws and Regulations, would be concurred in by this department. I answer in the negativ. The volume is made up exclusivly of reproductions of chapters and verses from the Bible and we have not progressed here to the extent of regarding that sacred book as obscene or indecent.

"If the volume referred to is offered to you for mailing, you should take it without question.

"Very respectfully,
"JAMES N. TYNER,
"Assistant Attorney-General.

"The volume is herewith returned."

In how far Mr. Tyner was guided by religious prejudice or political policy in reaching his decision we cannot tell, and it may be that he was led only by sound legal maxims and considerations of equity. He may have justly concluded that a book could not fairly be condemned for the primitiv plainness of isolated passages, reasoning that the general character of the volume and the apparent intention of the writer must be taken into consideration. Had the judges who tried D. M. Bennett, E. H. Heywood, and Moses Harman, known and respected these unassailable principles great wrongs would have been prevented, and the lives of two earnest humanitarians been lengthened by, perhaps, many years. If the judge who sits at the trial of Mr. J. B. Wise knows the fundamental axioms of the law which he is charged to execute, the prompt verdict of the jury will be "Not guilty."

We will close this statement with the appeal of the National Defense Association for funds with which to conduct the defense of Mr. Wise:

"TIME TO BE MOVING.

"The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are all sufficently informed of the facts in the case of Mr. J. B. Wise, the last arrest of a Liberal under the Comstock obscene literature mail law. They know that this earnest, wide-awake worker was confined during four long weeks, between the 16th of June and the middle of July, in jail at Leavenworth, Kansas, for mailing a postal card containing only a quoted extract from the Old Testament. He is now out on bail through the kindness of his Liberal brother, George Harrison, of Clay Center, Kansas, awaiting trial in October next. The National Defense Association has held two meetings to consider what ought to be done in this matter, and has decided that it is time to make a general call upon the Liberals of the country to stand by the one in distress. It is not only necessary that we should do all that can be done to prevent injustice and punishment being inflicted upon Mr. Wise, but it is also important that this event should be made use of to create as much discussion as possible as to the moral quality and character of scriptural texts and the question whether millions of books should be distributed in the hands of young and old if one brief verse here or there may be bad enough to cause the imprisonment of a man who quotes and sends it by mail. A good many very interesting problems and opinions will be likely to be brought out in the full and wide discussion of this affair. If the Liberals of the country will provide a liberal fund for offense as well as defense, it would be employed as judiciously as we know how to awaken public sentiment previous to the trial and to defend Mr. Wise on trial. There are practically only about two months to work in, and therefore we request an immediate response to this call for subscriptions from all who are willing to chip in and lend a hand in making this a celebrated case. The chip is knocked off our shoulder and it is time to show what we are good for. It is some time since we have had such a fight on hand, and really a long time since the Liberals have been called on for any subscription to the Defense Fund. Subscriptions may be forwarded directly to THE TRUTH SEEKER office or to E. B. FOOTE, Jr., Sec. N. D. A.,

Mr. A. B. de Guerville, who went to China as a commissioner for the Columbian Exposition, tells a reporter of the New York Herald what the Chinese think of some Western things. He says that he once had a talk with the Chinese Secretary of the Navy, Loufan Louf, and the Governor of the Military School, both graduates of the English army and navy, when one of them exclaimed:

"Why, we hav never had yet a show against you foreigners! We were living quietly in our country, not caring for what was going on outside, which, after all, is our right, when all at once the French appeared under the pretext of sending us missionaries, who would giv us a better God, the real one. The English came under some Bible pretext, too, saying that the Catholic God of the French was not any better than our own, and both countries, with guns and cannon, obliged us to accept the one its missionaries, the other its goods and its opium—which was still worse for us than the priests. . . . Missionaries then came to us from all parts of the world, not one of them believing altogether in the same church or God—for you can never make us believe that the God of the Catholics, of the Jews, of the Protestants, is the same! They laughed at us because we had a God of the Sun, and gods of war, but they began to teach us that in the history of their church a man stopped the sun in its course for several hours. They also spoke of a flood which covered the earth. Well, we can easily prove to them that such a flood never existed in China and never destroyed the Asiatic races! . . . ."

We suggest that the American Board of Foreign Missions send half a dozen of the best missionaries it has at its command to convert to the "true faith" these educated "heathen." Perhaps if they succeed in getting them they will stand a little chance of winning a few hundreds of China's four hundred and fifty million inhabitants.

Our impulsiv contemporary, the Ironclad Age, seems to need a careful editor. Referring recently to the severe Sunday laws of Arkansas, which forbid dancing and all games of amusement, even in the seclusion of the home, it says: "In this way the legislators pass as saints, but in spite of all, godlessness is on the increase there." It immediately adds, in the next sentence: "Lawlessness was never greater, and never were more crimes committed than now." Does Mrs. Powers wish to be understood as saying that the increase in lawlessness and crime is due to the spread of godlessness or to the rigorous religious laws? Probably to the godlessness, for if there is more crime "now" than at any previous time, it means that when there was less godlessness there was also less crime. We should hav said, what observation in other localities convinces us is the truth, that the intolerant laws drive thinking men and women into skepticism and Freethought, while doing nothing to restrain the classes inclined to crime; in fact, such statutes, by limiting the opportunities for innocent recreation, are real stimulants to viciousness and crime. There is always mischief ready for idle hands and brains.

Here is a sample of the average "argument" for the divinity of the Bible. It is from the Baptist Gleaner:

"A thoughtful gentleman who has read every book that he could find against the Bible, says three things kept him from being an Infidel: 'First, I am going somewhere. To-night I am a day nearer the grave than I was last night. I hav read all such books can tell me. They shed not one solitary ray of hope or light from the darkness. They shall not take away the guide and leave me stone blind. Secondly, I had a mother. I saw her go down into the dark valley where I am going, and she leaned on an unseen arm as calmly as a child goes to sleep on its mother's breast. I knew that was not a dream. Third, I hav three motherless daughters. They hav no protection but myself. I would rather kill them than leave them in this sinful world if you blot out from it all the teachings of the gospel.'"

We fear that this "thoughtful gentleman" has had access to very few Freethought and scientific books. Because his reading of secular works has not furnished him with an indexed guide and section map of the New Jerusalem and hell, he is not going to giv up his faith in the Bible, a book whose writers had as little accurate knowledge of those worlds as they had of the western hemisphere of the earth, a part of this globe which God, who made it and inspired them, had not yet discovered. No doubt his mother died serenely; millions of adherents of all religious faiths, and those who are the adherents of no religious faith, hav died serenely. But that hardly proves that all these divergent faiths, and Infidelity also, are from God. Such an "intelligent gentleman" should know better than to generalize so broadly from so narrow a basis of fact. This man of extensiv reading reaches the climax of absurdity when he says that he would murder his three motherless daughters, if he was going to die, did he not believe in the Bible. It is well that the Bible has some restraining influence over some Christians who were unfortunately born with homicidal tendencies. If he were less emotional and more "thoughtful" he would realize that all the perils that threaten motherless and fatherless girls are ever present in this world, God or no God, gospel true, or gospel false, and that God has permitted millions of these unprotected ones to liv lives of agony and go down to premature destruction. And other millions whose good Christian parents survived them suffered the same terrible fate, in spite of the saving grace of the gospel and the hand of the omnipotent god. The Baptist Gleaner should put on the witness stand a man who knows something of the world in which he livs.

The Church and Freethought.

From the time when man evolved from barbarism into that state of intelligence which gave him some knowledge of his natural rights, the history of the human race has been emblazoned by the story of his glorious struggles for liberty. When we think of this, we are compelled to ask, Why the struggle? Why must the sword of war be unsheathed, strife take from the brow of the world the laurels of peace, and the earth be drenched in blood that man might obtain justice from his fellowmen? Was not man born with his rights? In the infancy of the human race, were they not cradled with him? To our primitive ancestors, we are led to believe, serfdom must have been an impossible state. Did not the vast earth upon which they trod, with its illimitable resources and countless benefits, over which was the smiling welcome of nature, breathe the air of freedom? The heavens, with their myriads of stars and unbounded space, while they inspired the deepest emotions, also seemed to proclaim liberty and equality. Yet here was the foundation of superstition, the cause of all the evils to which flesh is heir. Here the mind of man in its undeveloped state became the slave of every fancy. He had not yet begun to think. He was awed by the wonders of nature. Life consists of a conflict for the means of existence, and in the struggle he was compelled to battle with the elements. But he did not dream that he was "a part of one stupendous whole," governed by immutable law. His surroundings led him to feel that a personality that acted capriciously with special reference to himself invested all phenomena that he beheld. His reason had not yet begun to assert its sovereignty, and his every thought was controled by his passions and emotions. His

> Untutored mind,
> Saw God in clouds and heard him in the wind.

And—

> His soul proud science never taught to stray
> Far as the solar walk or milky way.

Here is a demonstration of the fact that ignorance of natural law is the mother of superstition. It follows, then, as the night the day, that superstition blinds us to a recognition of our natural rights and liberties. On all sides, man was under the dominion of spooks, who, he thought, held his very life in their hands. As centuries rolled on, and knowledge increased, the spooks, which at first were on all sides of us, were relegated farther away, and their numbers also began to diminish. He could breathe more freely now, as the supernatural agencies were largely withdrawn. Science had not yet begun to unfold the secrets of the universe, and the lesser spooks were finally concentrated in one great spook called God, without whom, it was said, we cannot account for our existence.

The followers of the great Persian philosopher, Zoroaster, believe that there is a never-ceasing conflict between two elements, one the element of good, and the other the element of evil. If we call the element of good knowledge, and the element of evil ignorance, we must admit that the Bactrian sage, whose life furnished the material out of which the mythical Moses was constructed, truly described the state of the world. The element of good has been Freethought, and the evil element the priests. To-day the great conflict is still raging. Intelligence has still to pay toll to ignorance. The priest claims the exclusive privilege of instruction concerning the things of the next world, and he has tried to possess himself of the keys of knowledge in this one, and considering the misery, degradation, and crime of which he has been the instigator, we may also truthfully say that he is the possessor of the keys that unlock the gates of hell.

In the Christian religion these two forces have met together in their greatest conflict. There are two reasons for this: First, Christianity is formed from the union of two elements of antiquity, Asiatic and Egyptian asceticism moulded by the laws and institutions of Rome. Draper says that, in a political sense, Christianity is the heritage of the Roman empire to the present world. He might also have said that every impression that Christianity has made for the past eighteen hundred years has been because of its alliance with the political powers of its time. Christianity seized upon the fragments of the decaying empire of the Cæsars. The Roman augur was replaced by the Christian priest. The temples of the gods were used for Christian churches. The pope took the place of the emperor, and the world which had been subject to the one now became the vassal of the other. The ministers of him who said, "My kingdom is not of this world," found themselves joined in marriage with the kings of the earth.

The second reason is the Christian doctrine of the divine inspiration of the Bible. That book was declared to contain the sum of all knowledge. What conflicted with it was to be destroyed. Those who rejected it were considered unfit to live in the next world, and when not desirable occupants of heaven they were consequently not desirable for association with the saints in this world.

In the outset we are told by Christian apologists that we must draw a distinction between the church and Christianity. They say that while Christianity is a perfect system of religion, the church has sometimes deviated from the true principles of Christianity. In reply to this, I would say that the church is the representative of Christianity, and the only one it ever had. When considering the effects of the Christian religion, we look only to its organized form, and that is the church. It is folly to say that the church departed from the teachings of Christianity. The Protestant would say that the Catholic church was the counterfeit church. Then for one thousand years there was no true Christianity on earth, and Christ said, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." Where was he at the time true Christianity had no representative? or did he sometimes join bad company, as when Satan led him up into the mountain?

The union of these two elements in Christianity caused it to suppress the old Pagan religions by force. It suppressed the philosophical schools of Athens and Rome. It raised up a Constantine, a Charlemagne, a Torquemada, and a De Montford. It extinguished the light of science, crushed Freethought, imprisoned and burned a Bruno and a Vanini. With the power of the state behind it, it enacted laws prohibiting freedom of speech and liberty of the press. Christianity boasts of being the cause of our civilization. Liberty of thought and speech are the forerunners and accompaniments of a high civilization. Yet show me a Christian country that has not at one time or another in its history enacted laws denying both of them an existence. When united with the state, Christianity has ever made itself a monster of tyranny and oppression. Again, we are met by the Christian apologist, who undertakes to enlighten us by saying that the persecutions of Freethought by the church, which have made the very name of Christianity odious to liberty, are not the result of the Christian system when properly understood.

The Christian historian Prescott expresses surprise that a religion whose cardinal principle is peace on earth and good will toward men should have been propagated by the sword and stake. But in the same work he himself explains the true cause, when he admits that the very tenets of Christianity themselves cannot make it other than a bloody, intolerant creed. He says that from the earliest history of the church it was taught that the only proper punishment for the Infidel was fire, as it is a forerunner of what he will receive in the next world. Ergo, the doctrine of hell, by arousing the most brutish passions, has ever inspired Christians with a thirst for the blood of those whose honesty of mind compelled them to reject its teachings. Still we are constantly told by Christians that we ought not to blame Christianity for the misdeeds of its followers. Christianity I arraign at the bar of history, and I charge its doctrines and precepts with having corrupted the minds of the best of men, and while a tree is known by its fruits it is equally true that the fruit of persecution is invariably the offspring of that poisonous vine called Christianity. So I say to the Christian apologist: The monstrosity, religious persecution, is the child of your religion; you have nursed it at your breast for centuries. Do not be so dishonorable as to cast it now upon the world, a nameless and unnamable foundling.

The church bears in a certain sense two relations to Freethought, and in another sense there is but one. I refer to the two great divisions of Christianity, Protestantism and Catholicism. The Reformers of Luther's day had no higher conception of Freethought than had the church of Rome. The Reformation was a rebellion based upon dogma, not upon principle. While Luther denied the supreme authority of the pope, he maintained the supreme authority of the Bible. He looked upon disbelief in the paper pope which he set up with as much horror as the Catholic dreads rejection of the one of flesh and blood. He believed in religious persecution, not only of the papist, but of the Protestant who did not share his views.

Catholicism denies the right to exercise the private judgment. It steps up to the independent thinker, and demands an unconditional surrender. Protestantism permits us to use our reason, but holds us responsible for the conclusions thereof. George Jacob Holyoake draws the best picture of Protestantism I have ever seen. He says that it places before the world a Bible; underneath it the infernal regions. In front of it a creed, and above, the gentleman whose name it is not always polite to mention. Then it says: Read the book, but if after having done so you do not arrive at the creed in front, the gentleman above will pay his respects to you and politely conduct you to the regions beneath.

In spite of this, Freethought owes something, however insignificant, to the Reformers of the fifteenth century. When they declared their independence of the Roman church, there was an innovation of thought that encompassed the world. Not that religion was wholly responsible for it. Not so. The Reformation was equally the result of a political disruption. Its real cause was deeper than either of these. It was the revival of learning which followed the Turkish invasion of Europe. When Luther denied the infallibility of the pope, he logically admitted the right of anyone to deny the infallibility of the Bible. But how many know that Protestantism has always fought to abolish the effects of its own teachings! We are told by Protestants that the Catholic church is guilty of the crimes which we charge upon Christianity, but that their church is innocent of them. Now I would not make such allusion to the Catholic church as would lead anyone to think that I was not aware of the bigoted and intolerant spirit of the Lutheran, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, and Episcopal churches. We must remember that these churches never possessed the power of the church of Rome. Measure their crimes by their opportunities for committing them, and you will find that their enormities when they had supreme power were not inferior to those of the Catholic when in a like position. For evidence of this we need not go back four hundred years; we have only to direct our attention to the conduct of these churches toward Freethought in the nineteenth century. Was it not a Protestant government that imprisoned book dealers for selling Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason"? Did not the same government imprison Richard Carlile and Edward Truelove for publishing Freethought literature, and Robert Taylor for delivering Freethought lectures? In what country was George Jacob Holyoake sent to Gloucester jail for the crime of being an Atheist, and G. W. Foote to Holloway jail for blasphemy? In Protestant England, a country whose greatness is said to have its source in the Bible, the bishops, priests, and preachers of all denominations united their forces to keep one Atheist from its legislative assembly after he had been duly elected, but by the indomitable pluck of Charles Bradlaugh and the perseverance of English Freethinkers the combined forces of bigotry were defeated.

Our own country is not free from the stain of Protestant persecution. Blasphemy laws have been in force and prosecutions have been made within late years, as in the cases of Abner Kneeland and C. B. Reynolds. It is said that the Protestant church established and perpetuates Freethought, but it nevertheless imprisoned Viktor E. Lennstrand in Sweden and Dr. Voelkel in Germany for delivering Freethought lectures. Christ said, "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone." The Protestant church is not so free from the sin of persecution that it is entitled to cast the first stone at Catholicism or, in fact, at any other religion.

When we consider the great conflict between the church and Freethought, which has been raging for centuries with the entire Christian world for a battleground, we do not often think how great was the disparity in numbers, wealth, and opportunities between the combatants. Except in abundance of truth and right, Freethought has been poor compared with the church, but the church has always been a pauper in the light of these. The church has been upheld by the force of law, prejudice, custom, and military power. It has had popular literature and wealth behind it; Freethought has had none of these. It has been proscribed by law. The galling prejudices and fanatical passions of man hav been brought into operation against it. It has had to contend against unjust and discriminating laws in the past as it has to do in the present. It has been taunted with the poverty of its followers. Yet Freethought has ever been the torch of the investigator, the road to truth, the guiding star of him who looks forward to the betterment of humanity, until to-day it invades the church itself, and in the persons of its most brainy and progressiv ministers demands that the dogmas which the intelligence of the nineteenth century has outgrown be cast aside, even though they lie at the foundation of Christianity.

Consider the opportunities of the church for doing good and contrast them with the evil it has done instead. It might hav spread knowledge, but it used its power for the perpetuation of ignorance. The one thousand years of its history when it existed in its greatest prosperity are designated as the "dark ages." Well are they named, for the vandal hand of the Christian priest put out the light that had been shed by the ancients and left the world in the dark shadows of ignorance and barbarism. Read the history of Greece and Rome, compare it with the history of the Middle Ages, not extenuating the vices of either period, and witness the transition downward that Christendom made.

The church might hav been a power for the advancement of science. Instead of thus bringing blessing upon the world, it deemed the study of nature's laws unnecessary and sinful, declaring that the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God.

The church might hav been a great power to fill the world with peace and love and hasten the practical brotherhood of man. Instead it has caused during the eighteen hundred and ninety years of its existence more strife, hatred, and bloodshed than cursed the world during any other equal period known to history.

The church might hav been a power for liberty, but it has been the bulwark of slavery, and has ever been arm in arm with the rich against the poor.

The church claims that its object is to prevent crime. For fifteen hundred years it has had unlimited power to accomplish this, and we still hav crime and oppression that startle thinking minds for the safety of the commonwealths. The rope is still prone to encircle the necks of Christians, and the jails, state prisons, and lunatic asylums are filled with the products of the church. In the face of this, we are told that all the blessings we enjoy are the result of the churches being among us, and we are asked what the world would be without them. I answer, We well know what the world has been with ecclesiastical organizations and we know it could be no worse without them, and hav reason to believe that it would be better.

Look now at another picture. Behold the effects of Freethought wherever it has gone, whether by its spirit or the individual work of its great apostles. It has ever lifted its voice against Christian oppression. It has ever stood guard over the priceless heritage of man—liberty. In England it has made the three great struggles for liberty of the press, which was finally achieved in that country. Charles Blount, in the seventeenth century, struck the first blow. The Christian historian, Macaulay, has been obliged to admit this. Thomas Paine, in the eighteenth, by his "Rights of Man" struck another, and Charles Bradlaugh, in the nineteenth, fought the fight that brought complete victory.

Through Franklin, Jefferson, and Paine in America, the seeds of independence were sown, and the result is the Constitution of the United States, which declares absolute separation between the church and government, retiring the Christian God from participation therein. In France, Freethought was instrumental in bringing about the revolution which banished the last relic of feudalism in Europe.

Nearly three hundred years ago, Freethought, in the person of one man, battled against the Catholic and Protestant world in behalf of the right to teach science to the people. Though Giordano Bruno perished in the flames Freethought here gained a great victory, which the present generation is willing to recognize. When seeking for a savior of the world, I would prefer Bruno to Christ. He gave up his life with greater courage and for a much better cause. Christ died to save people from a hell in which they were never lost. Bruno died in an effort to save them from a hell in which Christ's followers had placed them. Christ, who had claimed to be the son of God, and who said that no man could come to the Father but through him, in the agony of death cried out, "My God! my God! Why hast thou forsaken me?" Bruno, who had taken upon himself no such distinctions, coolly replied to those whose taunts he had received, in the sarcastic prophetic sentence, "It is with more fear that you pass this sentence upon me than that I receive it." From Bruno to Darwin Freethought has been the protector of science. The greatest scientists have been Freethinkers, and science is the basis of every true Freethinker's philosophy.

Let no man ask, What has Freethought done? Let him look about him and see the work of Christianity swept away, and the results of Freethought shining like precious gems in every department of civilization. It does not appear to-day as the mere destructive critic of theology. Being based upon science, and science being impossible to the human mind when under the bondage of superstition, its scope is wide as the universe, its methods those of the greatest minds of the age.

There is coming another conflict between the church and Freethought. It is for the complete secularization of the government. The church has always been the great monopolist. It has been the chief of the privileged classes. It has never been willing to stand upon its own feet. That it might accumulate property it has succeeded in escaping its just share of taxation. That it might obtain the attention of the people, it has succeeded in passing Sunday laws, thereby having a monopoly of the first day of the week. It has encouraged rascality by making it possible for Sunday contracts to be nullified and voided in many states. It insists on thrusting the Bible into our schools and haughtily offers up its prayers in our Congress. The strength of the church is in its union with the state, and when this union is severed its power for evil will cease. Freethought must soon gain another victory over the church. Let us not think that the battle is ended. We must profit by the advantages already gained, and we can do so only by pushing forward to greater results in the future. The struggle in years to come will be on the same lines that it has been in the past. Not until mankind shall stand erect before reason with the same force and numbers that once knelt down to superstition will it cease.

Freethought, in the guise of heresy, is in the church to-day. It is breaking out on all sides. Rev. Dr. Pierson, who for a time was Spurgeon's successor, said that the fundamental principles of Christianity, "the inspiration of the Bible and the divinity of Christ, are assailed." We seldom hear of the fall of man. They draw lightly on hell. Infant damnation is a thing of the past. The thoughts, and not the words, of the Bible are inspired. Blessed are the defunct dogmas of Christian theology. They have died in the Lord. They rest from their labors, their works do follow them. May they never have a resurrection.

It is often said that Freethought offers nothing as a substitute for Christianity. The great English author, Dr. Thomas Inman, said he thought it impossible for an iconoclast to tear down prevalent beliefs without, in the nature of things, furnishing something in their place. Through skepticism, we are enabled to see the errors in prevailing systems of theology. But what is behind those errors? Truth, which we believe should be sought by all. When we deny Christian dogmas, what do we offer in place of them? We are frank to admit that some of them are so barbarous and silly that we would bury them all, without even a tombstone to perpetuate their memory. But for the following Christian doctrines which we deny we would substitute the subjoined affirmations which we claim to be true:

1. We deny the infallibility of the Bible as a guide. We affirm with equal force the superiority of reason, aided by experience, and test everything by its standard.

2. We deny any knowledge of the supernatural. On the other hand, we declare the existence of the natural, believing it to be the all-in-all; that it contains the entire sphere of human duty, and will satisfy the needs of man.

3. We deny God's government of the universe. We affirm that it is governed by immutable law, independent of any personal supervision.

4. We deny God's providence. We affirm that effect follows cause, and that the history of the world does not justify us in assuming that any law of nature has been changed. We have a providence, however, but instead of it being a God of whom we know nothing, it is science, of which we know much. By science as a providence we mean that by knowledge of the working of natural laws we are enabled to thwart danger, and embrace opportunities of relief from ills that assail us.

5. We deny the efficacy of prayer. We affirm the necessity of personal effort to secure everything required in life.

6. We deny the moral right of any deity or government to punish an individual for any opinion he may hold upon any subject. We affirm absolute liberty of conscience, and maintain that honest opinion upon any subject should be respected and its holder exempt from prosecution here or hereafter.

7. We deny that morality is founded upon supernaturalism. We affirm that its necessity exists in the very nature of the individual and of society; that it is a matter between man and man, not between man and God.

8. We deny that Christ can save the world from sin. We affirm that salvation from what is immoral and degrading must come through intelligence, the cultivation of virtue, and the control and direction of our desires by reason.

9. We deny that the chief end of man is to glorify God and prepare for a future existence. We affirm that his highest and noblest object should be to bring this world to a state in which his conception of heavenly bliss shall be a reality.

Church Bells.

The bells, the bells; the brazen-mouthed bells;
Scattering their discord wherever man dwells;
Clanging, resounding, disturbing the air,
Calling the faithful to church and to prayer.
Relic of barbarous rite of the savage,
When will this inhuman noise cease to ravage
The ears that are deaf to the creeds they proclaim,
The hearts that care not for their time-honored fame?
Down the next street a sick mother may lie,
Watched over, cared for, and dreading to die.
Praying to liv for her children, who tread
Softly the floor as they near the sick bed.
Quiet and rest the sick mother may save;
Physicians are helpless, but rest she must hav.
Out bursts the ear-splitting, nerve-racking call,
Of the merciless bells; can she liv through it all?
How many invalids, powerless to move,
Are killed by the bells that announce so much love?
But what does it matter; the death of a stranger
Is nothing when immortal souls are in danger.
Reader, stand with me beside a church door,
While up overhead can be heard the loud roar
Of the bells as they call on their owners to come
And receive what they pay for, a sermon and some Fine music, and also a chance to uphold
Their dearly-bought standing as lambs of the fold.
Watch, as they slowly approach at a pace
Quite in keeping with sanctity; look at each face.
Observe what a saintly expression it wears.
Their motivs are good and no Infidel dares
To assert for an instant his doubts as to whether Religion or fashion has brought them together.
Clang go the bells; can you hear 'tween the peals
The message, this call to the godly, reveals?
Like the apostles of old, the tongue in the steeple
Speaks different language to different people.
Clang! come along Mrs. Portly, array
Yourself in your raiment and come here and pray
That your health may be spared, that you may not get fat,
And that Portly will buy you that dream of a hat.
Clang! come along Mr. Portly, arise;
Your business will prosper if you are but wise
And establish your fame as a God-fearing man;
Be seen in your church-pew as much as you can.
Clang! come along, and, Miss Portly, remember
The splendid young man that you met last December,
Is going to sing in the choir from this out,
And perhaps you can bring a flirtation about.
Clang! and the eloquent minister hears
And, gathering the notes of his sermons, he fears
That he will be called to a flock very soon
Who will pay him more money for salvation's boon.
Clang! and the lame and the halt and the blind
And the deaf and the dwarfed and the feeble of mind
Are told by the bells to be thankful the curse
Rests so lightly upon them; it might hav been worse.
Clang! and the bells to the stranger declare,
That beneath can be heard a most eloquent prayer.
Clang! and a sermon of excellent piety,
Also, he'll find here the best of society.
Clang! and our organ is matchless in tone,
And our choir, we assert, is inferior to none.
Clang! you are welcome, but stranger, of course
We expect you will leave us a mite from your purse.

There once lived a preacher, so history tells,
Who preached out of doors and knew nothing of bells,
And nothing of churches, or dogmas or creeds,
But whose life was replete with beneficent deeds,
And who taught a philosophy simple and grand.
In his name all the churches of Christendom stand,
And his simple philosophy claim that they teach;
But where do they practice the things that they preach?
If their master should come and be with us once more,
And liv out the life that he lived once before.
What bell-ringing church would a welcome extend,
Would lend him its pulpit or make him a friend.

MORGAN A. ROBERTSON.

Call for the Eighteenth Annual Congress.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the American Secular Union held at the residence of Dr. Juliet H. Severance, July 28th, it was decided that the Eighteenth Annual Congress of the organization be held in Chicago, Oct. 26th, 27th, and 28th.

Various religious denominations, ignoring past differences—and the history of Christianity demonstrates that these hav been most serious—recently convened in a parliament and agreed to work in unison for the uplifting of humanity. Certainly Liberals should not display a less conciliatory spirit than the orthodox sects. Assenting to this, and remembering that only in union is there strength, the board adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Freethought Federation of America be invited to unite with the American Secular Union in holding its Eighteenth Annual Congress, and that Mrs. Freeman be requested to communicate this resolution to Mr. S. P. Putnam.

It is also urged that all societies which accept the "Nine Demands" send delegates to the Congress, and that Liberals make a grand effort to attend this Freethought Parliament. Let every auxiliary send its representativs. The World's Fair Congress was a splendid success, but this is its equal in importance. The enemy is activ, enforcing Sunday laws and securing Sunday legislation, opposing the taxation of church property, the value of which is assuming alarming proportions, securing the appropriation of public funds to sectarian institutions, demanding that the Bible be read in the public schools—in fact, not one effort to rob the people of liberty has been relinquished. The National Reform Association, the Sabbath

Union, the Epworth Leagues, the King's Daughters, the Women's Christian Temperance Union—all these hav banded together, presenting a formidable front, and it will require the united efforts of Liberals to defeat so unscrupulous a foe, owning allegiance, as it readily admits, not to this government, but to a heavenly ruler, thus endeavoring to establish a theocracy on the ruins of the republic. How to best oppose this purpose and the other unpatriotic schemes of our antagonists must be considered at this Congress. We must work together, accepting this much of the wisdom of our opponents, that "those who are not for us are against us."

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN,
Cor. Sec. American Secular Union.

News and Notes.

On Wednesday, July 25th, I leave Sault Ste. Marie for Drummond, Mich. I voyage along the broad and sweeping St. Mary's river, which pours from Lake Superior into Huron, a distance of sixty or seventy miles, the pathway of the great ships and steamboats from Chicago, Buffalo, etc. It seems to be a busy thoroughfare for the commerce of the lakes. The shores are thickly wooded, with low mountain ranges and an occasional village. Very few cultivated lands appear. It looks as if the primeval forest was still flourishing, and amidst it the cabin of the frontier settler, where for his morning meal one can even now shoot the partridge or club the porcupine or catch fish, but can rejoice only in a scanty quantity of bread and potatoes.

It is a beautiful day, and though one might welter in the crowded city, on board the swift steamboat the cool gales constantly fan the cheek and the roughening waters spread away in ever-changing expanses. At 1 o'clock, when we reach Detour, the nearest shipping point to Drummond—which is nine miles away—and to reach this point I must take a sailboat, which adds to the variety of my journey. There is not much breeze and it takes about four hours to make our destination. It is pleasant to thus drift almost unconsciously along the waters, where there is scarcely a ripple—the white sails idly spread and the shores slowly changing along the glittering horizon. Right here begin the Thousand Isles, large and small, scattered for a hundred miles into the Georgian bay with every variety of form and making picturesque scenes through the winding liquid pathways.

I arrive at Drummond at 6 o'clock. This is the only settlement on the island. Farms are scattered over it, and here about the post office, store, and hotel are gathered twenty or thirty houses. There is a primitiv aspect about the place. The bustle of civilization is entirely absent. It is a haven of quiet where the days and the years might roll by with scarcely any alteration. This place was started over forty years ago by Mr. Daniel Murray Seaman and family of the Mormon church, after it was broken up and scattered by the death of Joseph Smith. The Seaman family are here unto the present day and are stanch Liberals.

I giv six lectures at this place and the hall owned by Mr. Edwin Seaman is about full every time. Pretty nearly everybody comes, except the minister and some faithful disciples who will not run the risk of losing their faith. There is one church here, the Methodist, which exists rather as a formality than anything else. I hav been in hopes that the "elder" would attend the meetings and giv a chance for debate, but so far he has kept quiet, although he is generally belligerent on theological questions.

I find Drummond on the whole to be quite a Liberal community. As far as ideas are concerned it is as advanced as any place on the continent even though it is so far from the center of activity. It seems to draw a good deal of freshness and vitality from the bosom of nature itself. It is a lovely place to spend the summer days. The groves about it of pine, oak, maple, birch, etc., afford many a delightful shady retreat. The broad waters, flowing among scores of islands in view, present a brilliant panorama from morning until evening. Sometimes the surface is perfectly glassy; then the breeze sends a million ripples rolling over it; then the sudden squall darkens the view. The boats skim along, the yacht is occasionally seen and the whistles of the steamboats are heard at Detour, as they come and go on the great main channel. There is an interesting variety of prospects; not of the grand or exciting order, but of the gentle and alluring kind. It does not seem dull here a bit. In fact, it is a luxury to be thus out of the strifes of civilization, where nature breathes her spell of soft contentment. One scarcely takes any note of time as the gorgeous days pass with variable light and music.

On Thursday Mr. Edwin Seaman and myself voyage over to Harbor Island, to the residence of Mr. Wells Church. This island is quite a resort for parties from Chicago, "Soo," etc. The waters about take the shape of a horseshoe, and that name is applied to it. Among these innumerable isles both the water and the land assume almost every imaginable object.

Mr. Church is a Liberal all over and exceedingly well posted, and many a confab has he had with the priests, and hoisted them with their own petard. He has been in this country over a quarter of a century, and is one of its leading men. He has been county superintendent and is quite interested in educational matters. Like Alexander Selkirk, he is lord of all he surveys. He owns nearly all the island. There is talk of putting up a hotel and starting a summer colony at that place. It is one of the most attractiv spots I hav visited.

Mr. Edwin Seaman, who has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the beginning, came here forty years ago, when he was about ten years old, with his father. He has thus "grown up" with the country, and has progressed from the "Latter-Day Saints" to science and humanity. He has been prominently identified with the Liberal cause for many years. It was through his efforts that this Freethought campaign was started—the first thing of the sort in this part of the country. In previous years there has been some Liberal organization, and TRUTH SEEKERS and Freethought books hav been well circulated. Mr. Seaman has been variously interested in the material and business prosperity of the country, as well as devoted to advanced ideas. He has found good support in the work.

Samuel Seaman, Ludlow Seaman, Don Carlos Seaman, Murray Seaman, George Seaman, and David Murray Seaman are of the same stock, and stand by the colors with the same generous spirit. Samuel Seaman is the eldest of the brothers and is especially well equipped for Freethought service, and is able, if need be, to speak upon the platform. Church history is his favorit field of discussion. Mr. C. H. Fairchild, who introduced me at the lectures, has been here ever since the organization of the township and is one of its officers. He is not afraid, if need be, to plunge into the wilderness and blaze the path of progress.

Wm. Denion, James Melvin, John Gates, Captain Morgan, George Morgan, Lafayette Morgan, Wm. Anderson, Daniel Willoby, and others, are among the number who contribute to the work and are enrolled in the advanced guard, willing to be counted for Freethought.

Mrs. Betsy Elizabeth Seaman, mother and grandmother of the Seaman family, is the "oldest inhabitant" of Drummond, and with her husband was the first to make a home on the island forty years ago. She has passed through many trying experiences since that time. She has now passed into a sunny old age, and can rejoice in the fruits of the pioneer struggle. It is humanity that has shone out, and not divinity, in that varied pathway.

The clergyman of the place, Mr. Strickland, did put in an appearance on Saturday night, and asked a few questions, but not after the Socratic method, but in a rambling sort of fashion wherein curiosity seemed to prevail over logic. I thought he would ask all about my cousins and aunts and everything connected with the family tree. To use his apt simile, he was like a mule kicking in every direction without much reference to the point to be made. He seemed to hav no idea of parliamentary rule. However, I made out to get him down to something relativ to the subject; and there was some order in the debate. To giv the people a chance to hear both sides I asked him to meet me on the following day, Sunday, and uphold his religion. But this he refused to do. The day was too holy for the logical defense of Christianity. It seemed to me, however, that that was just what he ought to be doing, and the holier the day the better the deed, even from his standpoint. He declared that he would "stand up for Jesus" sometime in the future. If I ever do return to Drummond I shall certainly make him toe the mark, and meet the issue if he has the courage of his convictions. I am sorry that during the whole of my six lectures he could be present only one night, and showing by his questions then that he had not the slightest idea what Freethought is, which ignorance might hav been removed had he listened with his own ears to what I had to say and not trusted to the reports of others, which is too much the fashion with orthodox clergymen, who are so valiant in knocking down a man of straw.

Monday, July 30th, was a clear and breezy day, and in good time we made the voyage from Drummond to Detour. While at Detour I enjoy the generous hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Bunker, who are stanch Freethinkers. Mr. Bunker is foreman of the mill here, which is one of the largest in this part of Michigan. I hope some day to be able to giv a lecture at Detour, Sault Ste. Marie, etc. There is a Liberal element which, at present, is inactiv. Mrs. Bunker, who is of the Seaman family, was present at my lectures, and returned with us on Monday. Mr. John Gates and Ludlow Seaman are the faithful pilots of the boat in which I hav an exhilarating voyage. No matter how swift the wind, they can trim the sails and bring the Secular Pilgrim safe to shore.

I leave Detour at half past one Monday afternoon, and arrive at Mackinaw city just in time to take the train for Chicago, whence I proceed westward. The strikes, and hard times generally, and bad harvests, make it impossible to go to the Pacific coast this fall. I shall put in my work in the interior states, with Chicago as my headquarters. I shall also help arrange for a joint congress of the Freethought Federation and American Secular Union the latter part of October. I hope there will be a great rally to this congress, and from this point we can push forward to a good winter campaign. Wherever it is possible let arrangements be made to push the work by platform and press.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Cause in Oregon.

The Oregon Secular Park is dedicated. The day was a delightful one and everybody was happy.

Not only the Secularists of Oregon, but of every state, hav reason to feel proud of the splendid gift of David and Caroline Wittenburg, of New Era.

On the Fourth of July the Oregon State Secular Union laid the foundation of a magnificent enterprise, but it will require the co-operation of the thousands of Liberals on this coast to make it as successful as we wish it to be. The large and handsteamer Geo. W. Shaver, of Portland, was chartered by the First Secular Church, and a jollier crowd of merry day makers never boarded a vessel. Our Portland friends were joined by a delegation of about thirty from Forest Grove, while Scappoose, Corvallis, Milwaukee, Canby, Oregon City, and other places were represented.

B. F. Hyland and D. C. Stewart, of the executiv board of the Oregon State Secular Union; John Price, of Scappoose, and B. F. Jagger, of Oregon City, old stand-bys of Secularism, who support it not only with "best wishes" but with money wherewith to carry on the good work, were there to giv us strength and hope for the future.

For ten days previous to the excursion Mr. Smith superintended a crew of men at the park, clearing away the underbrush, cutting out pretty trails, and making shady nooks for the picnickers. A force of carpenters, for whose work Mr. Gustav Hicketheir, of the Portland Secular Church, paid, erected a 40 x 40 foot dance pavilion, booths, and stand. Mr. H. H. Wheeler, of Canby, of whom the lumber was ordered, donated $20 worth of lumber; while our farmer friends at New Era, Messrs. Friedrich, Spulac, Veteto, and Irvine Wheeler hauled the lumber from the mill to the park—six miles.

Too much cannot be said in praise of our friends Mr. and Mrs. Burgoyne, Mr. and Mrs. Friedrich, Mr. and Mrs. Spulac, Mr. and Mrs. Wink, of New Era; Mr. and Mrs. W W. Irvin, of Barlow; and Dr. and Mrs. Olds, Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Booth, Mr. and Mrs. E. N. Ford, and Mary A. Booth, of McMinnville, and others, for their generous donations of food for the men at work.

While there were a number of Portland merchants who gave contributions, and to all of whom we feel grateful, yet I wish particularly to mention Closset & Devers, wholesale coffee and spice deslers. Mr. Devers is such a whole-souled, splendid fellow, so straightforward in his dealings, and withal has been so generous to the Secularists, that it givs us pleasure to recommend this firm to Secularists everywhere. We believe in patronizing people who patronize us. Don't forget this firm, and country merchants going to Portland call and see or write them, and be sure to tell why you do so.

Among the retail grocers, Mr. Steinfurth and Mr. Chas. Saunders, both of South First street, hav contributed so generously that we will always feel indebted to them. Were I to mention the names of all the good and generous friends who helped make this affair a success, this letter would hav to appear in several numbers of our Liberal papers.

The hard times hav made our work very, very difficult, but through all the encouraging letters and support of these friends hav given renewed hope.

I cannot speak of the program in detail. The children of the Forest Grove and Portland Secular Sunday-schools sang, Nettie A. Olds delivered the Declaration of Independence, and addresses were made by Annie E. Barker, Edw. Alisky, Thos. Kemp, and myself.

In a neat little speech, Edith Kemp, daughter of the president of the Portland Secular Church and librarian of the Portland Secular Sunday-school—thirteen years of age—on behalf of the donors, presented the deed for the park to President W. W. Jesse, for the Oregon State Secular Union, who responded briefly, outlining the past work of the Oregon State Secular Union, the outlook for the future, and thanking Mrs. and Mrs. Wittenburg for their generous gift.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Wittenburg responded, wishing success and prosperity to the Union and its friends.

The dedication of the park was a most enjoyable affair, but the real hard work is yet to follow. Before another camp meeting we want to hav laid the foundation of the Pacific Coast Secular University, and also, in the vicinity of the park, build a crematorium, and a joint stock company for this purpose is about to be organized.

New Era is on the Willamette river, twenty miles from Portland, has both steamboat and railroad facilities, and is as pretty and healthful a place as anyone would wish.

Even the name of the place is strikingly appropriate, and with the coöperation of Secularists, we can here build a magnificent university where parents all over the world who wish their children educated without superstition, will hav an opportunity to do so.

The park is about three hundred feet above and overlooks the Willamette river and valley for miles.

MOSES AND MATTIE E. HULL

The past two weeks the Spiritualists hav been holding camp-meeting at New Era. Moses and Mattie E. Hull were the leading speakers, and their brave words attacking theological humbugs, and in behalf of the emancipation of the people from all superstitions, did incalculable good for Secularism. Mr. and Mrs. Hull are well known all over the world as thorough Secularists, and if more Spiritualists were as honest, sensible, and broad as they are, the phenomenon of Spiritualism would attract more attention than it now does.

Nettie A. Olds, of the Portland Secular Sunday-school, Annie E. Barker, of the Forest Grove Secular Circuit, and Mr. and Mrs. Hull spent a most delightful day at Castle Kehm, enjoying its rugged scenery, and discussing past and future work of the Oregon State Secular Union. While Mr. and Mrs. Hull are on the platform, Secularism will hav at least two talented teachers.

To Mr. and Mrs. Brettel, of Rochester, N. Y., we wish to extend our thanks for their constant contributions of reform literature, which has enabled us to send out scores of pamphlets and papers.

Also to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for his encouraging words in regard to the work of the Oregon State Secular Union, recommending its plan to other states.

SHELTON AND ROSEBURG, WASH.

The Oregon State Secular Union is not confining its work to this state. One circuit and two Secular Sunday-schools in the state of Washington hav organized under its jurisdiction. Mrs. M. E. Shelton-Cyphert is the leading worker at Shelton, while Mr. and Mrs. O. C. Lee hav charge of the Roseburg circuit.

In localities where we hav not been able to send a lecturer, a copy of one of my lectures is read each week by a member of the local auxiliary.

A Teacher's and School Director's Coöperativ Bureau has been organized, whose purpose it is to register the names, etc., of school teachers and directors who are Secularists, and introduce them to one another, with a view to supplying, as far as we can, teachers for the public schools of this state who are Secularists, knowing that in this way religion will not be taught in the schools. We would like to hear from every teacher who is a Secularist and competent teacher.

We also want members of school boards, in Oregon and elsewhere, who are Secularists, to write us if they want such teachers.

We need your help in this matter. You want your public school free from religion, and we want to help you to hav it so. Don't be indifferent.

The Sixth Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union: The executiv committee hav not yet decided when the convention will be held, but Forest Grove wants it, and it may be held there. We understand that the townsite of Forest Grove was dedicated to "Almighty God," and with the understanding that there should never be a saloon in the place, and that only things of a religious nature should be allowed there. Mrs. Barker, our able lecturer, in charge of the Forest Grove circuit, is rapidly educating the people there out of religious nonsense, and if the convention is held there we hope to go a thousand strong, and for three days hold a convention such as the Secularists of Oregon hav never seen.

MEMBERSHIP.

Since last convention 355 new members hav joined the Oregon State Secular Union. Is your name there? If not, write for membership blank now. You can at least join the Union.

DEBT.

There is a balance of $68.45 due for lumber, and twenty-five thousand shingles and several thousand feet of lumber are yet to be purchased before the speaker's pavilion, dance hall, and necessary walks for future use can be completed.

Robert R. Laughlin, of North Yanhill, who has been one of the stanch Secularists of this country, and made many contributions of money for the work, died at his home, June 19th. Annie E. Barker, lecturer of the Forest Grove Secular Circuit, conducted the funeral services.

Annie K. Miller, wife of P. H. Miller, of Canby, died June 19th. Funeral services were conducted by me.

KATIE KEHM SMITH,

Nodding Philosophers.

Anti-vaccinationists hav unearthed an enemy in the person of Prof. Thomas H. Huxley, who, as quoted in Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, says:

> If my next door neighbor · · · is allowed to let his children go unvaccinated, he might as well be allowed to leave strychnine lozenges about in the way of mine; and if he brings them up untaught and untrained to earn their living, he is doing his best to restrict my freedom, by increasing the burden of taxation for the support of jails and workhouses, which I hav to pay.

Dr. Foote casts some doubt upon Mr. Huxley's authorship of the foregoing, but I find by reference to the professor's lecture on "Administrativ Nihilism" that the words are there sure enough. The lecture as a whole shows that the author is something of a Populist. There is, however, a suspicion of carelessness in his argument, especially as applied to vaccination; because if that rite—that is, the rite of vaccination—has the value claimed for it, those who practice it hav nothing to fear from small-pox. If Professor Huxley's children contract small-pox, that fact would demonstrate one of two things—either that inoculation is not a preventiv, or that he has allowed his children to go unvaccinated and has thereby been guilty of an offense equal to disseminating strychnine lozenges or hunting his neighbor with a gun. Where he finds a leg to stand on while advocating compulsory vaccination is something which I am totally unable to discern.

Professor Huxley has contributed a great deal to strengthen the position of Freethinkers. Whether other Freethinkers hav ever assisted him to strengthen or to attain his own position I do not know, but in all my reading of his works I do not discover that he givs them any credit for doing so. He has, I believe, about equal disregard for believers and unbelievers. His dissertation on the Mosaic "wall," which has been quoted in THE TRUTH SEEKER, shows that he certainly has no appreciation of the labors of his predecessors—Paine, Volney, Taylor, Bolingbroke, and others—who had so riddled the Mosaic wall that he need not for a moment hav debated the question of going around or over it. It was already full of holes. Huxley's main fault is his failure to recognize the services of his co-laborers. I once sent him a copy of Taylor's "Diegesis," with a view to finding out what he thought of it. Professor Huxley replied in words to the effect that while a hundred years ago there might hav been some excuse for a man in jail to write such a book, there was none for its continued circulation and perusal outside. To be sure, Taylor lacked the advantages of the knowledge acquired in the past century; possibly some of his remarks were crude; but if biblical criticism advances in the next century as it has in the past, how will Mr. Huxley's own words sound in 1994? Does he think that his ideas about vaccination will be accepted then? Would he even repeat them now?

The fact is, the philosophers must be read with suspended judgments. In 1861 Mr. Herbert Spencer, noting the failures among the attempts to run cars by electricity, said: "Daily are men induced to aid in carrying out inventions which a mere tyro in science could show to be futil. Had those who supplied the money [for the construction of "electro-magnetic engins"] understood the general law of the correlation and equivalence of forces, they might hav had better balances at their bankers." Electric motors were running almost within the sound of my voice when I first read the foregoing quotation, and I imagin that the balance at the bankers of the electric motor companies is quite satisfactory. Poor old correlation and equivalence are passengers.

In the court of the undiscovered one man's guess seems to hav about the same standing as another's.

An Earnest Worker's Greeting.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: So long a time has passed since I hav talked with you or to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that I'm afraid I shall seem to most of them, or at least to the many new readers, a stranger. I used to feel, in the "long ago," that though you, like the late editor of the New York Tribune, was born an editor, a little help would always be acceptable; but to-day, with the weekly "Observations" of your more than talented brother (a genius of the first order), with "News and Notes," the interesting letters from across the water by our friend Charles Watts, and sometimes a communication from John Peck (who hammers his objector as he hammers the iron upon his anvil till he becomes smooth and pliable), what can your readers need with the dry words of one who has entered her seventy-eighth year? It is not you that need me, but I that need you.

What a grand time you all must hav had around, not the grave but the monument which bears the name of Thomas Paine; and the deed, so like you, Mr. Editor, to giv us, the many who could not be with you, the entire proceedings. I do not wonder that Mr. Remsburg has read "The Knight-Errant of Freedom" so many times. The conception is so beautiful—an entirely original thought in words as fine as were ever wrought into verse. What shall I say of the rest of the program? Surely it was everything that could be desired. I'm glad that we hav had these yearly demonstrations of honor to the memory of Thomas Paine, for I hav no doubt the church will soon claim him as a Christian, and make the arm-chair which is supposed to be the resting-place of Washington in heaven, wide enough to hold Thomas Paine. What think you, dear friends who read THE TRUTH SEEKER, about miracles, when I tell you that the young people of the society who worship in the Westbourne Park Chapel, London, Dr. Spurgeon's church (now, since his death, Dr. Clifford's), invited M. D. Conway to lecture in that chapel upon Thomas Paine, and he complied; and Dr. Clifford in the pulpit offering prayer, and the enthusiasm over the lecture breaking out into frequent and loud applause! I am old enough to die, but I think I shall liv to know that Colonel Ingersoll has by invitation lectured in the most orthodox churches in Boston and New York upon Thomas Paine. I ought to hav said in its place that Dr. Spurgeon preached the most terrific "hell-fire and brimstone" doctrin, and sent more people to endure it than any modern minister I hav ever read; and Mr. Conway, surely all Freethinkers know of him and his works; his "Earthward Pilgrimage" has been my bible many years, and now his "Life of Thomas Paine" is grand.

I am hoping to liv long enough to see "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I hav no doubt the old adage, "A patient waiter is no loser," will be exemplified in the case of this book, but we began to expect it without counting the cost. I hav finished my sheet, and nothing of Heston; no matter, he speaks for himself and will always be heard. I am always yours,

LUCY N. COLMAN.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Freethinkers of Kansas will hold a convention in Lawrence, Kan., September 6th-9th. Preparations are being made to hav it a grand success. Excellent speaking and singing will be the distinctiv features of the occasion. Many Freethinkers—Agnostics, Spiritualists, and Liberals of other shades—hav signified their intention of being present and participating in the deliberations of the convention. Kansas is having good crops this year and, notwithstanding the calamity of the great strike, its people are hopeful and look forward to better times in the not distant future. W. S. Bell is now lecturing in Kansas, helping to prepare the minds of the Liberals for the coming intellectual feast. His address is 114 East Fourth street, Topeka, Kan.

THE Friendship Liberal League, George Longford, secretary, meets at 2:30 and 7:30, every Sunday in Warner's Hall, Broad and Wallace streets, Philadelphia. Freethought publications are on sale at the meetings.

THE Scranton Secular Union meets every Friday evening at 421 Lackawana avenue. Our motto: Freedom and Kindness. Everybody invited. Secretary, William Watkins.

THE Detroit Investigator Society meets every Sunday afternoon at the hall, No. 32 Monroe avenue.

Letters of Friends.

Would Like to Enroll His Name.

CHRISTINE, CAL., June 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6.50 for the books you sent me some time ago and for the renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would like very much to hav my name enrolled in Mr. Putnam's book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," but times are too hard just now, so will hav to forego for awhile the pleasure of reading it. Respectfully yours,

JONAS MYERS.

Success is Sure.

NEW YORK, July 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Since I ordered the book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, I hav a little audience of neighbors nearly every night to read the paper. They are too poor to order it themselvs, but they devour every word of it. This paper is really a gem of its kind. It is an intelligent, truthful, and progressiv work. It strikes home. Keep it up, friends, and we will surely gain in the end. Wishing success, I remain, Yours truly,

LEWIS CHASKIN.

Tiresome, but Must Be Done.

EDDYVILLE, N. Y., July 16, 1894.

MR EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for renewal from February. I am in love with the paper and think it is doing a great good, but it looks like a thankless task to keep up a continual fire on all the superstitions of the times. But it must be done or our liberties are gone, and we are bound down with all the old Puritanical laws that were enacted when the church held the power; when they could burn witches according to law. I see that you are vigilant and watchful, with your eye on all the tricks of God's holy men. Yours for progress, F. LARABEE.

He is Dead Asleep Now.

CLOCKVILLE, N. Y., July 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed fifty cents for "Thumbscrew and Rack," "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," "Religion a Curse, a Lie, a Disease." I rode fifteen miles one day to see an Infidel. I wanted him to giv twenty-five cents to distribute the Paine memorial paper. He would not giv five cents. He said he expected to sleep when he was done with this life, and he didn't fret himself over Freethought or politics. I am going to see him again and lend him a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Freethought reading, and see if I cannot arouse him to the idea that there is work to be done in this world, and that he can sleep just as sound in the hereafter for doing it. I lend or giv away most of my papers. There are not many Freethinkers in this community.

Yours for Freethought and free speech,

R. L. STISSER.

A Few Words for C. W. Goff.

COLUMBUS, KAN., July 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am sick, but must write. Do not refuse to publish a few expressions of grief and appreciation for my departed friend. "How blessings brighten as they take their flight!" As I was reading, in pain, your items, the death of my noble friend caught my eye, and spontaneous tears rushed down my cheeks to relieve unutterable emotions. During the Convention at Chicago in October last, he and I were at the Russell Hotel. Incidentally on the first dav I gav him a clue to my history, especially the persecutions—rough treatment, personal dangers, mobs, and perils of life—I encountered forty to fifty years ago, when I had told too much heretical truth, and that I had come there as an object of charity at the risk of my life. Few strangers (even Freethinkers) would do as he did, giv me $5, with spontaneous sympathy and generosity. I hav no doubt if he had been present he would hav added to his gift in the public contributions I remember with great gratitude. His zeal, enthusiasm, energy, love of truth, and humanity were conspicuous to the convention, as well as his generosity and public spirit, in behalf of a scientific, humane, truth-teaching Freethought college. I observed his frank, plain way of expression in his discussions, which many did not like, but I wish we had far more such men. Whatever his faults, I think he could say like me, I am neither a liar nor a hypocrit. Dear friend, farewell. You leave an indelible record on my impressible brain. J. H. COOK.

Freethinkers Should Not Fear Free Thoughts.

WESTBORO, MASS., July 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, which credit to my account. With a growing and increasing family it is not a little difficult keeping even with the world. Still times are not so hard in the East as in the West; for the reason that communities whose wealth consists largely in money feel the contraction of currency last of all. It is only, to use a homely expression, when the old cow is milked dry that they suffer.

You probably hav a tolerably clear idea of how to run your paper; but in reply to those who seem to think the observations of your brother George, in regard to finance, are detrimental to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will say its sale will increase; furthermore, I cannot understand the opposition of Freethinkers to free thoughts properly expressed. An old slave owner cared mighty little about the thought of the slave so long as he got the result of his labor. Just so we can talk about mental liberty until we are black in the face, but if we are financial slaves what does it all amount to?

In regard to woman suffrage, perhaps I do not get Mr. George Macdonald's idea, but it looks to me like this: Women ought not to vote, for the reason that a majority of them are likely to vote for unjust measures. Bearing in mind that a large proportion of the present legislation of the English Parliament and the American Houses of Congress is intended to mitigate the legislativ wrongs of the past, the above argument would hav a tendency certainly to disfranchise men. It is not unlike the mental process of the boy holding his companion down on the barn floor. "I'll not let you up, for if I do you might get me down."

I hav a friend who says he will subscribe for your paper. Respectfully,

Z. A. GLEASON.

Mortuary—Jackson Shull.

DELPHOS, O., July 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: On Thursday, July 19, 1894, Jackson Shull, a pioneer of Allen county, Ohio, died at his home in Beaver Dam.

With the consciousness of an honorable and virtuous life well spent, at the age of sixty-seven, while lying in the arms of his daughter, and as if falling asleep, he passed peacefully away. Death had no terrors for him; he died as he had lived, without fear of the future.

In an early day he came with his father from Wayne county, Ohio, and the family settled in the dense forest where the village of Beaver Dam is now located. His father laid out the village in 1851. Jackson Shull followed his trade of stone and brick mason nearly all his life. In youth he obtained only a common-school education, but he was a life-long student and had few, if any, intellectual peers in Allen county. His library was filled with the best of books, among which was Thomas Paine's complete works in three large volumes. Kind and charitable to all, it has been said he had no enemy in the world. He was always willing for others to enjoy all the rights he claimed for himself. By his death the Freethought cause has lost a faithful and effectiv worker.

He left to mourn the loss of one they loved so dearly, Julia Ann, the partner of thirty-eight years of happy wedlock, and his two daughters, Mrs. Cora Weaver, wife of B. W. Weaver, and Miss Lula Shull. No man was more kind to his family. They can go to his grave and truthfully say: "He who lies here never gave to us a moment of pain; from his lips, now dust, there never came to us an unkind word." He laid up no "treasure in heaven," but by his industry and frugality he has left for the maintenance of his loved and loving family property valued at over twenty thousand dollars.

On Saturday, July 21st, the relativs and friends met at the old homestead to pay their tribute of affection, to perform the last sad act of love to him who lay wrapped in quiet sleep. A beautiful and touching oration, prepared by John R. Charlesworth, who could not attend, was read by the undersigned. Hon. Charles N. Lamison, of Lima, O., a life-long friend of the deceased, followed with a fitting tribute of respect and love to departed worth. The remains were then borne to the Beaver Dam cemetery and, after the casket was lowered into the grave, the following benediction, also prepared by Mr. Charlesworth, was pronounced: "And now into the arms of Nature, our universal mother and our final home, we consign thee. Forever past the trials of life, forever free from the tears of sorrow and of pain, rest oblivious forever in thy windowless tomb, under the blue canopy of sky—in the sunlight, moonlight, and starlight. Sleep forever in summer's golden dawn, in autumn's chilling frost, and winter's shroud of snow. Sleep amid the warbling of birds, under the green of the grass, amid the perfume of flowers. Rest, sweet rest; sleep, eternal sleep, whose dust knows no awakening and whose repose dreams of no future. Peace, quiet, and rest; a last, long, and forever farewell."

The Lecture Field.

MOSCA, COL., July 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: From California to Iowa, and back to Colorado, is a long journey and full of interest in a Freethought way. I began my lecture trip at Merced, Cal., where some Freethinkers thought I was not severe enough in my arraignment of Christianity, to Boulder, Col., the prettiest city I hav seen in this Centennial state, and where I gave six lectures, and a funeral address over the remains of William E. McIntosh, a college graduate and young soldier in the state militia called out by Governor Waite to restore peace at Cripple Creek. While on duty at the mines he fell down a shaft 250 feet. The body was sent to Boulder, where he had resided with his parents.

By special request of the parents, thorough-going Freethinkers, I remained two days after the close of my lectures to deliver a discourse in accord with their view and his. They now particularly desire that every word of that address be published in our Liberal journals. I herewith submit it verbatim, leaving my notes of Pierson, Iowa, to come next in order, and so on back to Merced—"the first shall be last and the last first!"

A very large concourse attended the services at the house, among the hearers several clergymen, I am told, who had an opportunity for once in their lives of listening to a funeral "sermon" without one word concerning Christ, God, or other theological speculations. Mr. McIntosh next morning told me that it met his views and his wife's exactly.

The elegant casket was almost buried in flowers. His student associates in rich, melodious voices, sang selections from L. K. Washburn's Cosmian Hymn Book, one of the hymns repeated at the cemetery.

THE DISCOURSE.

On an occasion like this it is our custom to be brief.

We bring to you a philosophy of life filled with love for our fellow-beings; a philosophy which teaches us the value of reason, man's best guide; a philosophy of right-living, of moral worth; of nature; of all beauty and art; a philosophy which teaches us that nature is the only infinit, and that all events take place under the dominion of law—from the rolling of the mightiest orb in space to the rounding of a tear-drop or the fall of a leaf. Nothing is governed by mere chance—from birth to death, and including death, all is natural—pain, misery, sorrow, as well as joy—all are natural.

The Freethinker accepts the good, the beautiful, the true wherever found; proves all things, holds fast the true; endeavors to square his life by justice, mercy, kindness, good-will, irrespectiv of mere beliefs; grants to others all the rights he claims for himself; frankly and rejoicingly accepts the teachings of science, the true interpreter of nature; accepts honor as the pole-star of existence; rejects every creed which is not in harmony with canons of common sense; fears no master, and acknowledges none; stands self-reliant when clouds shadow; firmly faces danger, and, if possible, averts calamity through the exercise of intelligence; sings hymns of Freedom; believes in humanity; hates cant, hypocrisy, and cruelty; despises despotism; loves liberty better than life.

These are the principles of Mr. and Mrs. Lemuel McIntosh, and these were the principles of their son whose body here before us rests in the silent halls of death toward which our feet are hastening. "'Tis only a question of time." He has simply gone before us.

No mere words of human sympathy can obliterate the dull pain of separation, nor fill the void which death makes in the heart of mother, father, brother, sister, friend.

Time may assuage grief; but the wound remains, a scar—a lingering memory. We accept the inevitable, hopes and fears, and cannot blot it out. This is the decree of nature, which has never been set aside.

But there is a joy in the night of gloom—the sunshine of a happy disposition—the bright promis of a noble manhood.

William E. McIntosh had fairly entered upon manhood's career, full of courage, nearly twenty-four years of age—would be the 11th of August—a general favorit, beloved by a large circle of friends in Boulder and vicinity. He was conscientious, studious, true. This young patriot, when he heard the voice of duty, sprang to the service of his country, to the very front of danger. He met his death in the discharge of that duty; brave young comrade, as deserving of honor as if he had yielded up his precious life amid the din and smoke of the battle-field. Long will he be remembered by every friend with pure affection. His memory is a benediction.

These words are for you, father, mother, for every member of the home circle. As for the rest, silence is the most eloquent tribute.

AT THE GRAVE IN PRESENCE OF MILITARY, COMPANY H.

TO HIS COMRADES: Devoted to the welfare, the perpetuity of the American republic, you are soldiers not for conquest, but for equal rights, for liberty, for universal freedom under the glorious flag of our union.

Beneath the clear blue skies of Colorado, his nativ state, your comrade, manful and true, sleeps his last sleep. In your hearts his memory will be ever cherished.

Company H then went through the impressiv military salute, three volleys over the grave of their comrade

Not His Position.

BYRON, ILL., July 14, E.M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. S. P Putnam evidently misapprehends my position in regard to an alleged universal intelligence if he considers it analogous to that held by Mr. D. W. Church, of Greenfield, Ia., as defined in "News and Notes" in yours of July 14th. This definition of Mr. Church's views is: "That the universal ether is a kind of universal intelligence, and that this intelligence, if we are open souled, will flow into the brain, and illuminate it, and thus we hav a power of insight that transcends knowledge and of which knowledge is simply the instrument. He denies personality to this infinit intelligence, and so practically denies that it is God" This latter part I indorse, but the other "definition" stands sadly in need of a definition that will render it luminous to the ordinary mind. For how any insight can transcend knowledge passes my comprehension, and that knowledge is supposed to be the instrument of insight is placing the cart before the horse, for knowledge must precede insight in every case, since there can be no insight into anything unless knowledge of it is first obtained; if not knowledge, at least strong grounds for assuming its existence, such, for instance, as that upon which the belief in the universal ether is based. And that this universal intelligence, if we are open souled, will flow into the brain and illuminate it, needs "illumination" about as badly as the former definition. It affords us, however, a sufficient insight into Mr. Church's philosophy to reveal that it is decidedly idealistic and pantheistic in its tendency, thus assuming positions in the polemical arena which I hav always repudiated.

While I concede a very low form of mind to the constituents of the ether, i. e., the ultimate atoms, I hav always strenuously opposed the assumption that there is a universal intelligence or mind diffused through the ether or immanent in nature, my main reason for denying the possibility of such universal mind being that the warring or clashing of the elements precludes the unification of the atomic minds into one universal intelligence. What produces our intelligence but the harmonious and united action of the mind-energy resident within our constituents? Disrupt this harmony and our mind or intelligence immediately terminates. The proper harmony to generate intelligence has its inception when the great elements, carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen, unite in protoplasm, provided they happen to unite in the right proportions. This is the starting point to higher forms of intelligence than what is innate within their components. While their harmonious action and coöperation persist, higher types of mind are the result through the centralization of their vito-psychic energy in a cerebral organ, but the moment inimical agencies enter the organism to destroy it, the intelligence which was but the result of a fortuitous concourse of certain elements in proper proportions and of the fusion of their immanent psychic energy, must cease and relapse again into its primordial atomic state. The same conditions, then, which would destroy intelligence in an organic being would preclude the possibility of the existence of the universal intelligence in space, since the eternal turmoil and confusion in space, outside of organisms, precludes the harmonious action which is essential to intelligence. There can be no more intelligence in nature, as a whole, than there can be in a brain or an organization on the point of dissolution by having introduced into it a deadly substance, which interrupts the harmonious action of the various parts. Absolute harmony and co-operation are essential to intelligence within organism; then why should they not also be outside of organism? But where do we find them in space?

Again, intelligence, as we know it, is a product of evolution. But evolution implies a beginning. How, then, can there be an infinit intelligence in the universal ether which had no beginning and is not subject to evolution in itself?

On the other hand, it is strictly in consonance with scientific data to concede an exceedingly low form of sentience to atoms, a mind or "primitiv judgment," as Edison calls it, on a par with or of the same caliber as the vital principle conceded to atoms by all scientists. We know that mind is associated with life. Go wherever you will, find life in its normal state, and you will find mind connected with it. Even many plants manifest low forms of consciousness, not to say intelligence, as well as the very lowest animal organisms in which not a trace of a nerve-system or cerebral organ is to be found. Their psychic acts beheld through the microscope are truly marvelous, proving, beyond all reasonable doubt, that mind exists outside of brain, and that it is therefore not dependent upon, or the product of, brain, but that the latter is essential only by the evolvement of higher types of intelligence. Mind, then, being inalienably associated with life in its highest as well as in its lowest forms, it follows that it must also be associated with the life conceded by all scientists to atoms.

Instead of the universal ether being a kind of universal intelligence, which Mr. Putnam believes to be my contention, I maintain that the universal ether, as well as its concrescence, matter, contains an infinit number of segregate atomic minds which when aggregated into the proper form produce the higher phases of sentient life. Still, we must also concede to these atomic minds judgment sufficient to start evolution in its career of development; but that it was immeasurably assisted therein by the various other factors of evolution. In other words, I hold that the mindless factors of evolution were vastly more instrumental in evolving the delicate adjustments and coaptations of organisms than the innate mind-principle of atoms; that without these auxiliary agencies the mind in nature could hav accomplished nothing.

If it had the intelligence to design, it would hav the intelligence to preserve for a reasonable period what it designed; but the horrible manner in which its formations are often destroyed proves that it is absolutely devoid of such intelligence.

Atomic mind can consist only of a mental tendency to aggregate into certain specific forms, but the various contingent factors of evolution do the actual work, carrying out this tendency to its inevitable sequence. HERMAN WETTSTEIN.

The God of Moses.

RAPID RIVER, MICH., July 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The soldier with the blighting foam of battle on his lips, and the war plague turning his blood to gall, may take part in the sack of a city, slay the helpless and innocent, outrage the noble and pure, and yet for him there is a feeble hope, a slim possibility, that when far removed from blood and battle, returned to the haunts of his childhood, he may remember his share in the carnage and crime with sorrow and regret, and some weak bedraggled virtue may struggle for existence in his war scorched mind. But for the soldiers of Moses there could be no such hope. Cruelty with them became a home pastime, torture a religious luxury, and the screams of outraged maidens, the agonized shrieks of the dying, were things to be remembered and recounted with delight long years afterward. Any virtues they ever had were as hopelessly dead as the antediluvians who perished in the flood. If such another act of ungrateful, unprovoked cruelty was ever conceived and carried out with such fiendish ferocity, in a manner so utterly degrading to all who took part in the butchery, it is buried in oblivion, as no historian has recorded it. Here every virtue was dishonored and every vice paraded in triumph, and we can read the teachings of Moses as plainly as if written in letters of fire. Make criminals and degrade yourselves, fawn, cringe to, and flatter the Lord God alone, and he will be to you a peculiar god, and you will be to him a peculiar people. It is an almost universal opinion that piety in itself is virtue; nothing could be falser than this, as the devotee who conceives his imaginary god to be of a cruel and revengeful nature will, as a matter of course, imitate the manners of his superior whenever he has the power; and as all gods are more or less cruel and revengeful, so all religions are more or less dangerous. And as religion is built by fear and selfishness, any priest would starve in the service of a deity who hated cruelty as much as the average civilized human, as the people would cease to fear him. God's vengeance is the lever by which the priest raises his salary, and the slimmer the contribution box the more vengeful his god becomes.

But no god was ever supposed by his followers to be all evil excepting the God created by this man Moses, and judging by the records in the Bible we cannot doubt that the conception Moses formed of his own god was that he loved evil for evil's sake; even the promises made to his own people contained the most dangerous viciousness; namely, commands to rob, torture, and slay all others. And we naturally inquire where, how, and by whom was this vicious worship formed? And all our knowledge of the bigotry displayed by all religious votaries would lead us to believe that it first took form among the Persians. Many considerations lead to this belief, but chiefly the following: 1. No nation or people of any importance was known to any ancient historian as inhabiting the land of Palestine until the time of the Maccabees.

2. At the time the Jerusalem colony or mission was established by Cyrus the power of the Persians throughout Asia was absolute, and Philip of Spain would hav been as likely to build a Mohammedan mosque for some tribe of Moors, as Cyrus, a bigoted believer in Ormuzd, to assist an insignificant captiv tribe to erect a temple to any god except his own. In fact, according to all religious notions, he would hav been committing a deadly sin, for which his own priesthood would hav placed him under the ban.

If we knew nothing more than this, it would be strong circumstantial evidence that the Jewish religion emanated from the Persians. But in reading the Jewish historical books in our Bible carefully, it becomes clear that they contain the history of two distinct peoples, one a fierce, cruel, fighting, numerous race, which all things point to as the Persians. The people led by Moses, interpolated into this history, was a weak, insignificant, tribal kingdom, with Jerusalem for its capital, tributary to Egypt until wrested from its grasp by Nebuchadnezzar, and to what race of people this tribe belonged will never be known, as Nebuchadnezzar wiped them out as clean as a school teacher could wipe a blackboard. We will quote a few of these interpolations and their opposits. When David numbered Israel, Judah had 500,000 men who drew the sword, and during Solomon's reign of peace they must hav increased. When Israel and Judah became separate kingdoms and Rehoboam reigned over Judah, he must hav had an immense army, and yet we find that in the fifth year of his reign Shishak, king of Egypt, came to Jerusalem and plundered the city, king's house, and house of God included, and Rehoboam and his immense army never lifted a hand to defend themselvs.

The supposition that vanity tempted the historian to exaggerate their strength does not explain it, as all vain, unscrupulous historians try to reduce the numerical strength of their own army and magnify the numbers of their opponents. And if this cowardly act of Rehoboam had been recorded by one of his people, he would hav been more likely to hav subtracted from than added to their numerical strength. And we cannot believe that any king with an army five hundred thousand strong was cowardly enough to allow his kingdom to be overrun by an invader without a severe and protracted struggle. Jehoshaphat of Judah, a successor of Rehoboam, as we are told, had an army nearly a million strong, and we find him and the kings of Israel and Edom going to war with the little kingdom of Moab, and but for some pious, deceitful ruse, recommended by one of God's prophets, they would all hav been annihilated.

From the time of Jehoshaphat until Palestine passed into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar no wars or pestilences of any account are recorded, and yet all the able-bodied men fit for his army found by Nebuchadnezzar throughout all the land was seven thousand. From these instances quoted, and a great many more that any careful reader can discover, it becomes evident that these books contain the history of two very different peoples; and we assert that the numerous and powerful fighting people whose history is recorded in these books was the Persian, and a well-known fact in their own history taken in connection with the Mosaic legends proves this: The early home of the Aryans and Persians was between the Oxus and Jaxartes in Central Asia, but whether the Persians were the kinsmen or bondmen of the Aryans is uncertain; all philology can do is prove a common language, and this would hav been so in either case. The well-known fact that the Persians, after separating from the Aryans, worshiped the Aryan demons and made their gods their demons leaves no doubt on the mind that they had some bitter cause of enmity against the Aryans. To understand how very bitter the hatred of the Persian leaders for the Aryans was we must imagin one Roman Catholic nation oppressing another until the leaders of the oppressed people become so infuriated at their God for turning a deaf ear to their prayers that they meet in solemn conclave and make a vow to their devil that if he will deliver them from their oppressors they will be his peculiar people and he alone shall be their god. The leaders would not tell the common people this or they would be denounced to their oppressors, as the more down-trodden a people are the more superstitious they become. If to encourage them they promised supernatural aid, it would be in the names of Mary, Jesus, Ghost, or God, and if success crowned their efforts, the names of old gods would be discountenanced and at length prohibited and their god be known by a new name, and the leaders, if true to their old devil and new god, would teach and lead their followers into all manner of crime and their old tales and legends would be turned upside down to put virtue in the mud and vice on top. They could imagin no other way to serve Satan. (Could the most intelligent believer in a God and a devil imagin any other way of serving his devilship?) In the Mosaic legends we find this was the course pursued by Moses. He pretended to be sent by their own god I Am to their aid with the promis of I Am's assistance; but as soon as they were free and desertion no longer to be dreaded, I Am disappeared and their god took a new name, and anything more criminal than the god-commanded acts of Moses is unknown to history, and in the old Abram or Brahma legends the scoundrel became the saint; and all through these Mosaic legends we can see the process by which the superstitious Persians were bullied and coaxed to abjure their god and worship their own devil without knowing it; and as they were the only people known to history who did this, it saddles the origin of the Mosaic worship upon them beyond a peradventure.

The I Am with whom Moses tried to encourage his people is, without doubt, a corruption of the old Aryan or Hindoo letters of holy mystery, A U M or O M, and as these sacred letters were unknown in Syria or Egypt, this again points with no uncertain finger to the Oxus and Jaxartes as the land from which these people, led by Moses, came. As there has been a good deal of speculation about the origin and meaning of these letters, I will tell a story and allow every one to draw his own conclusions.

Returning one evening from school with some comrades, a bull in a field by the wayside at sight of us commenced to bellow, and as the owner was not in sight, and there was a good fence between the bull and us, it was an opportunity not to be lost to imitate and tease him. While engaged in this frolic, one of the crowd exclaimed, "Let us spell it!" and I remember some of the different combinations of letters used were, A U M, and I A M, and A U O M; but we finally agreed among ourselvs that O M drawled to the time and tune of the bellow best expressed it. I may add that we knew nothing about Hindoo mythology or theology. In reading the old Aryan or Hindoo mythology or theology it is plain that their first and highest god, Indra, evolved from the bull and that his ancient enemy was Vittra, the serpent. This accounts for the fearful frenzy of Moses at sight of the golden calf, and Aaron's reasons for making it. Thinking Moses was lost he had returned to his old god, and his fear of Moses made him attribute its formation to pure accident, well knowing that Moses would resent a god fashioned in this form more than in any other. It is plain from the story that Moses, as well as Aaron, believed in images, and that he murdered Aaron, who stood in his way, in order to establish the worship of his serpent god. The image of his god was worshiped by the Israelites for hundreds of years. And this likewise accounts for his murdering all the priests, from a month old and upward, who had left their nativ land, and filling their places with creatures of his own training. Between these priests, whom he had trained in the doctrin that cruelty and crime were piety and dear to God, and him some rupture must hav occurred, and as they had been his tools and knew all the schemes and murderous plans he adopted to rid himself of obnoxious parties, they seem to hav lost no time in taking a hand in the game and bowling the old man out, as their priestly story of a man like Moses, full of health and vigor, who would without doubt hav hung on to life with the greatest tenacity, going quietly of his own accord to Mount Nebo to die is too thin to be treated with anything except contempt by even the most superstitious. That Moses ascended some mountain with the intention of sacrificing a priest who had offended him is likely enough, but he had made a trip too many, and that his own rascally anatomy ascended to heaven in the smoke of a burnt sacrifice is confirmed by the continuation of the priestly yarn, where we are told that God went into the undertaking business and buried his old favorit with such care and secrecy that his sepulcher would never be discovered. Knowing he had dissolved in smoke, they would feel perfectly safe in making this assertion. Whatever we may think of these priests we cannot help feeling thankful that they saved earth, rock, or gravel on our globe from being contaminated by contact with the decaying remains of that out-and-out scamp and cutthroat, Moses.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Every Day Philosophy.

When weariness with life my spirit fills,
When deep disgust consumes me with my lot,
I draw some store of comfort from the ills
I havn't got.

To find that fortune at your coming flies,
To be bankrupt in health, in fame, in purse
Is bad enough; but I philosophize
It might be worse.

Incessantly we make a great ado,
The mouth of misery is wide agape;
But happier we, I fancy, if we knew
What we escape.

The common woes of life are bad enough,
Misfortunes fall as easy as the dew,
And still for every morning steak that's tough
There might be two.

This one is sick; his wayward fate cries out
Against the leech, the calomel, the bed;
O inconsiderate person, cease to pout—
You might be dead!

And this one hath the mitten; he has wooed,
Vainly, alack, his wooing it has sped,
Well—even in this there's comfort, rightly viewed;
He might be wed!

And here is one who whines; his all is swept Away in panic; he has had to "fail."
He should, I think, be cheerful that he's kept
Safe out of jail.

But late I lost a twenty dollar bill—
And did I wring my hands that I had b'undered?
Not I indeed—I'm very thankful still
'Twas not a hundred.

Sooth should I o'er capsize when walks are bad,
And my good clavicle involve in wreck,
Serene'y, I should say, how very glad
It's not my neck.

Oh, trust me—better not to make ado
At the few miseries of our common lot.
There's millions of 'em—if we only knew—
We havn't got.

Lincoln's Religion.

The popular belief concerning the religious views of "the grandest man ever made President of the United States" is that he was a believer in Christianity. Almost immediately after Lincoln's death Dr. J. G. Holland rushed from the press his "Life of Lincoln," affirming that he was a devout Christian. Dr. Holland's work had the slight demerit of being in essential particulars unreliable from the first page to the last. However, coming from the press when the public was horrified over the details of Lincoln's tragic death and deeply interested in everything pertaining to his life, Dr. Holland's biography of Lincoln had a large circulation and a great influence in making his claim concerning Lincoln's religion popular.

After two of Lincoln's intimate friends, Hon. W. H. Herndon and Col. Ward H. Lamon, exposed and refuted Holland's willful misrepresentations he modified the claim in Scribner's Monthly, and finally virtually abandoned it.

The testimony of Mr. Herndon alone is sufficient to establish the negativ of the question. If any one in the world knew the religious convictions of Abraham Lincoln that person was W. H. Herndon, for twenty years his law partner and beloved friend. So strong was their attachment for each other that the partnership was never formally dissolved, and to the night of Lincoln's assassination all the business of the law firm was transacted in the name of "Lincoln and Herndon."

The following letter from Mr. Herndon states most emphatically that Lincoln was not a believer in Christianity:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., June 13, 1890.

MR GRIFFEN—My Dear Sir: Your letter dated the 6th inst, making inquiries about Mr Lincoln's religion, was duly received. You ask me this question substantially: "Was Mr. Lincoln a Christian?" and in answer to the question let me say that Mr. Lincoln did not believe in the dogma of the fall of man, did not believe that the Bible was the special and divine revelation of God as the Christian world contends, did not believe in the atonement, and did not believe that Jesus was the only begotten son of God as the Christian world professes and contends; did in 1835-6 write a little book against Christianity and never revoked what he then wrote. In short, Mr. Lincoln was a Liberal—an Infidel, if you please.

Yours truly, W. H. HERNDON.

See my "Life of Lincoln," pages 439-447, for further information.

If Lincoln became a Christian after his election to the presidency he would at least hav intimated the fact to Mr. Herndon, whom he made an Infidel, and who was one of his dearest friends. The fact that he did not do so shows, as some of Lincoln's most intimate friends at Washington testify, that he died an unbeliever.

Mr. Herndon's testimony is corroborated by that of one hundred friends of Lincoln whose testimony is given in Mr. Remsburg's unanswerable work, "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?"

Christians believe in Hebrew ghost stories and infinitly absurd dogmas without a scintilla of evidence. But the majority of them believe that Lincoln was a Christian in spite of the testimony of all those nearest to him in the confidential relations of life who affirm the contrary.

A good many Christians seem to consider Infidel synonymous with Atheist, and Christian with Theist. They argue that Lincoln was not an Infidel but a Christian, because he believed in a God. If this argument proves anything, it proves that all Jews and Mohammedans are Christians, because they believe in a God, and also that two of the world's greatest Infidels, Voltaire and Paine, were Christians. Both Voltaire and Paine believed in a God, but even the most liberal Christian would be slow to admit that they were Christians

Hannibal Hamlin, vice-president with Lincoln, in a letter replying to an inquiry of mine concerning Lincoln's religion, calls him a "Christian man," simply because he was a moral man. A good many other Christians do the same when they know that goodness in itself does not constitute Christianity. A man can be a moral man and not a "Christian man." Christians hav not as yet a monopoly of virtue nor will they ever hav.

The fact that Lincoln was a Freethinker does not prove the Christian religion false or the principles of Secularism true, but it does show that the majority is sometimes mistaken and not on the side of truth; that Dr. Holland and many other "D. D.'s," who misrepresented Lincoln's religion, were not honest, and that the greatest, noblest man born on the continent of America was not a believer in Christianity. FRANKLIN J. GRIFFEN.

By R. WHEELER.
This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT we need above all is peace and a close attention to the terrible social problems which beset us.—Lord Salisbury.

IT is certainly true as a historical fact that the rational treatment of insane persons, and the rational view of certain kinds of crime, were due to men like Pinel, trained in the Materialistic school of the eighteenth century. And it was clearly impossible that the great and humane reforms in this field could hav taken place before the decisiv decay of theology.—John Morley.

REASON and experience show that no evil can be changed or diminished by applying to it a remedy similar to itself. Evil cannot be cured by evil. If you want to teach men not to be brutal, then you must not set an example of brutality in your law courts. Besides you yourselvs are largely responsible for the crime, because so many crimes spring from want, misery, and ignorance.—Annie Besant.

IF it is a function of beneficence to mitigate, so far as consists with other ends, the injustices of nature, then the lowly-endowed should not hav those injustices of nature from which they suffer made harder to bear by the needlessly harsh treatment of men. Negativ beneficence requires that such blame as their failures call for shall be sparing in amount and gentle in kind.—Herbert Spencer.

THE Bible states that God began his creation less than six thousand years ago. Now Darwin speaks of the known history of the world alone as "of a length quite incomprehensible by us," yet even that, he says, "will hereafter be recognized as a mere fragment of time." Even man is at least fifty times as old as the Bible allows. Professor Draper says that "it is difficult to assign a shorter date for the last glaciation of Europe than a quarter of a million years, and human existence antedates that."—George W. Foote.

O THAT the free would stamp the impious name
Of God into the dust, or write it there
So that this blot upon the page of fame
Were as the serpent's path, which the light air
Erases, and the flat sands close behind!
Ye the oracle hav heard:
Lift the victory-flashing sword,
And cut the snaky knots of this foul gordian word,
Which, weak itself as stubble, yet can bind
Into a mass irrefragably firm
The axes and the rods which awe mankind.
—Shelley.

THE preachers to the contrary notwithstanding, the trouble is not so much with men's hearts as with men's heads. Selfish as the world is, there is not so much selfishness as ignorance. For generations men hav been exhorted to righteousness by priest and prophet and in the name of righteousness hav wrought every evil under the sun. The cry, the unanswered cry, that is arising in the market place today is not the cry of the prophet to people, "O people, do righteousness." but the cry of people to prophet, "O prophet, what is righteousness?" This unanswered cry it is for us, in so far, to answer, because for us it has been answered.—Marshall E. Smith, in Conservator.

THEOLOGY of the old stamp, so far from encouraging us to love nature, teaches us that it is under a curse. It teaches us to look upon the animal creation with shuddering disgust; upon the whole race of man outside our narrow sect as delivered over to the devil, and upon the laws of nature at large as a temporary mechanism, in which we hav been caught, but from which we are to expect a joyful deliverance. It is science, not theology, which has changed all this; it is the Atheists, Infidels, and Rationalists, as they are kindly called, who hav taught us to take fresh interest in our poor fellow denizens of the world, and not to despise them because almighty benevolence could not be expected to admit them to heaven.—Leslie Stephen.

THE real democrat disdains interferences and interruptions. He approaches laws direct, not by intercession. Priests in pulpits and professors in universities may become obstructions to the vision. I would look the gods face to face, not by sufferance of classes who claim a special right to carry my message and swear to my credentials. He recommends himself who shows most insight. The mariner who drops a line deepest in the sea, the telescopic vision that farthest pierces space, the rapid intuition that most subtly and infallibly fathoms the mystery of being, holds in fee the authority of my credit. But formal knowledge piled heaven-high, and books of learned men, and merely verbal paraphernalia encyclopedic in its range, may hav no exchange relations with good sense and spiritual insight.—Horace L. Traubel.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectnal, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasnre is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject with out much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman,

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for its bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

Pleasure and Progress" has 398 pages, is splendidly printed from large, clear type, on excellent paper, and costs, bound in cloth, $1; paper covers, 50 cents.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

Not for Parsons.

JIMMY: Say, Sam; I guess I can tell how it was Balaam's ass spoke to him just that one day. Sam: How did you catch on to it? Jimmy: Oh, that angel standing there, that Balaam didn't see at first, was a pretty good ventriloquist!—Puck.

FRIEND: Your husband seems ill. The Minister's Wife: He is overworked, but he will take no rest. Three nights last week he insisted on going to see those hateful living pictures in order to more effectivly denounce them from the pulpit.—Puck.

A FEW days ago I attended a school examination. Here is an item for your "Not for Parsons" column: Teacher: What are nouns? Pupil: Nouns are names for persons, things, and abstract ideas. T.: Giv me an example. P.: Pedro, table, and (after hesitation) saint. T.: What means Pedro? P.: The name of a person. T.: What means table? P.: The name of a certain thing or object. T.: What means saint? P. (after some moments' reflection): A thing that does not exist. The boy could not explain better for smiles and laughter all around.—Martin Stecker.

RESPONDING to a toast at the Bristol Press Fund dinner on Saturday night, Rev. A. N. Blatchford said he could not help telling a Devonshire story illustrating the modern desire for short sermons. A country vicar, he said, once went to fill the pulpit of a colleague who was temporarily absent from home. After the service he thought he would gauge the effect of his discourse by the opinion of that very fair index of public feeling, the parish clerk. "Well, Rogers," he said, "did you like my sermon?" "I did," was the reply. "I hope I wasn't too long?" he anxiously inquired. "No, you wasn't too long about it," rejoined Rogers. "Well, then," said the vicar, "I hope I wasn't too short." "No," answered Rogers, "nor yet too short, neither. You was just about right." The vicar felt relieved, and said: "I am glad of that; because, to tell you the truth, while I was writing that sermon my little dog got hold of four of the folios and destroyed them, and I was afraid it would be too short." Rogers looked very thoughtful for a moment, and then very confidentially remarked: "Lor'! now; did he? I suppose you wouldn't mind lettin' our vicar 'ome 'ere 'ave a pup 'o your dog?"—Toronto Empire.

THE LATEST DECALOG.

The following appears in "Selections from the Poems of Arthur Hugh Clough" [Macmillan's], the latest addition to the Golden Treasury Series:

1 Thou shalt hav one God only! Who Would be at the expense of two?
2 No graven images may be
Worshiped—except the currency.
3 Swear not at all; for by thy curse
Thine enemy is none the worse.
4 Fail not on Sunday to attend
The kirk—'twill keep the world thy friend.
5 Honor thy parents—that is, all
From whom advancement may befall.
6 Thou shalt not kill—but need'st not strive
Officiously to keep alive.
7 Do not adultery commit;
Much trouble often comes from it.
8 Thou shalt not steal—an empty feat,
When it's so lucrativ to cheat.
9 Bear not false witness; let the lie
Hav time on its own wings to fly.
10 Thou shalt not covet—but tradition
Approves all forms of competition.

—Secular Thought.

I DOUBT not that you and your readers will be pleased to learn of two amusing incidents that occurred in our vicinity. The Rev. Mr. Mott, a local preacher, gave his congregation an interesting account of an adventure, of which he was the hero, while on his way to church that morning, and which may best be told in his own words: "As I was coming to church this morning ah, I met a young man carrying a violin ah; I told that young man to turn from the error of his ways ah, to drop that bundle of sin ah, and enter into the house of the Lord ah, and what do you think he said to me ah? What do you think he said to your humble servant ah? Why, he said, 'Blank, blank you, go to h— ah.'" The other incident that I hav to relate is that the name of a very pious member of the fold in a neighboring village, by some unaccountable means, reached your office, and as a result a sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER found its way to his residence. He is not accustomed to receiving very much mail, and there was some speculation before the wrapper was broken, which was done with great care, and in due time the full wickedness of the paper was discovered, whereupon, with all proper indignation, it was consigned to the flames, with the remark that "I'll show 'em how to cast their pearls before swine, blast 'em!" —Chas. O. Hays.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. KING DARIUS WRITES SOME LETTERS.

Then King Darius wrote unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you.—Dan. vi, 25.

News of the Week.

BOSTON will soon hav a system of elevated street railroads.

WYOMING Republicans hav nominated W. A. Richards for governor and declared for free silver and protection.

LEVI P. MORTON, ex-vice-president, is being boomed for Republican governor of New York. He seems to be willing.

JOSEPH BYRNES, a non-union engineer, was shot and killed by some unknown person at Danville Junction, Ill., July 28th.

IDAHO Populists hav nominated K. J. W. Ballentine for governor. They declare against fusion, and favor woman suffrage.

A STRIKE was ordered last week among men employed on New York city's new school buildings. About 400 out of 1,800 men stopped work.

THE American yacht Vigilant beat the Prince of Wales's cutter in the Solent race last Saturday, and around the Isle of Wight on Monday.

THE New York Constitutional Convention will doubtless reject the proposed Woman Suffrage amendment, as well as all other important measures.

THE Western corn crop has been badly damaged by hot winds, but late advices say that the injury has been greatly exaggerated by press reports.

REPUBLICAN and Populist fusionists in Tennessee were beaten in the state election. The American Protectiv Association (anti-Catholic) greatly influenced the result.

GEORGIA'S state convention of Democrats was held at Atlanta, August 2d. The platform adopted contains a silver plank which does not indorse President Cleveland's policy.

THE Senate has passed the last of the appropriation bills—the General Deficiency bill—which will now go to the conference for adjustment of differences between the two houses.

IN Monday's elections, W. C. Oates, Democrat, was chosen governor of Alabama over Reuben F. Kolb, Populist-fusion candidate. Oates is at present a member of Congress.

GEN. J. B. WEAVER, Populist candidate for Congress from the Ninth Iowa district, has resigned his place on the Farmer's Tribune, Des Moines, of which he was editor-in-chief.

GEORGE INNESS, the eminent American landscape artist, died last week in Scotland, where he was traveling for his health. He was a resident of Montclair, N. J., and his body will be brought home for burial.

THE electric motor company of Jersey City, N. J., has issued an order that motormen must pay for all damage done to their cars, "no matter under what circumstances the damage occurs." The employees naturally protest.

JAPAN has declared war with China and has won several important naval victories. It is doubted that she can maintain her prestige on land against the Chinese hordes. The trouble arose from disputed supremacy in the island of Corea.

SENATOR HILL of New York has presented an anti-Anarchist bill. It provides for immigration inspectors to be located at foreign ports, with power to keep undesirable persons from embarking for this country. It has passed the Senate.

THE committee appointed to investigate charges of bribery against members of the United States Senate, has reported that said charges are unproved. A minority report claims that the sugar schedule of the tariff bill was nevertheless dictated by the sugar trust.

NORTH CAROLINA Populists hav chosen their candidates from among the nominees of the Republicans and Democrats. The platform denounces the old parties, and demands the issue of greenbacks and the free coinage of silver, but omits the subtreasury bill.

BRIGANDS are terrorizing the vicinity of Cripple Creek, Col. They are mounted on stolen horses, and make raids, seizing cattle, poultry, and horses. The marauders are said to be recruited from the ranks of coal mine strikers. A vigilance committee has been organized.

EDITOR TEUFEL of the Socialist paper, Volkstimme, of Mannheim, Germany, and his printer hav been arrested on a charge of high treason, in having printed, August 3d, the republican manifesto of 1848. The printer, Dreesbach, was formerly a member of the Reichstag.

FIRE in the grand stand stopped the Chicago-Cincinnati ball game at Chicago last Sunday. Many persons were injured by contact with the barbed-wire screen, but there were no fatalities. Damage to club property amounts to $15,000. A cigar stump started the blaze.

CITIZENS of Defiance, O., celebrated this week the centennial of Mad Anthony Wayne's victory over the Indians and British at the junction of the Miami, Maumee, and Anglaize rivers. Governor McKinley and other distinguished guests were present, with 50,000 people.

NON-UNION railroad men at Brazil, Ind., were mauled and robbed last week. Union men deny complicity in the outrage. As a result of the trouble, the mayor ordered the police to arrest every man or woman who calls another a scab. A popular uprising will support the mayor.

LUMBER piles containing 25,000,000 feet of lumber, situated on the west bank of the river within a quarter mile of the center of Minneapolis, Minn., were destroyed by fire last week, causing a loss of fully $300,000. Railroad round houses and cars, together with the Pintsch gas plant, were also burnt.

AT a meeting of the General Strike Committee of the American Railway Union, held at Uhlich's hall, Chicago, August 5th, it was decided to declare the great strike off in that city. This does not include the Chicago and Eastern Illinois, nor the Santa Fé, where the men hav voted to continue the strike to settle local grievances and where they think they hav a fair show of winning.

SANTO CASERIO, the murderer of President Carnot of France, was found guilty and sentenced to suffer death at the guillotin. There was practically no defense and the jury was out but thirteen minutes. Caserio denied that he acted as the agent of any association of Anarchists, and claimed that all members of such orders worked independently. He received his sentence with tokens of defiance.

DR. E. B. FOOTE, SR., who on July 4th was nominated at Yonkers, N. Y., as the candidate of the People's party for Congressman from the Sixteenth district, has accepted the nomination. In his letter of acceptance he expresses his sympathy with organized labor, and says the only doorway of relief for the laborer, producer, artisan, tradesman, working capitalist, and true Jeffersonian Democrat, is the ballot box. Whatever political party Dr. Foote may be affiliated with, his sincerity and motivs cannot be questioned.

THE most dangerous counterfeit of United States money discovered for years is announced from the Treasury Department. Because it is so difficult of detection from the genuin note, and in order to put the public on its guard, the counterfeit is described in minute detail by the Secret Service. It is of the ten-dollar legal-tender note, series of 1880, check letter B, face plate No. 2,250, back plate No. 2,292, signed by W. S. Rosecrans, Register; James W. Hyatt, Treasurer, and bearing a portrait of Webster and a large round seal.

Agents Wanted!

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Journal of Freethought and Reform.

Vol. 21. No. 33 {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, August 18, 1894. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 Per Year.

ONE RESULT OF OUR CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION.

A condition which confronts thousands of honest working girls—starvation or shame!

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies will soon adjourn, but the people of the country will remain in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the fund and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

At Washington, Indiana, an impromptu dance was in progress not far from the house of the Methodist minister, Rev. Mr. Grayville. Suddenly the preacher appeared among the dancers and ordered them to disperse. As he was not obeyed, he overturned the violinist and put out the lights. Taken before a justice of the peace, he was fined. Denying the authority of the justice, he soon found himself within the walls of a jail. If he considered the dancing wicked, he should at least hav remembered that that was only his private opinion, which he had no right in law or equity to force upon his neighbors. If, however, the music and hilarity disturbed his quiet, he should have remembered that hundreds of people are disturbed every Sunday by church bells, but they do not rush into the churches and throw out the sextons. Then people living in houses situated near churches are often seriously annoyed by noisy religious services, Sundays and evenings. And, finally, he had a remedy at law if the ball was really a nuisance. He seems to be an "Anarchist" as well as a bigot.

Secular and Religious Education.

The Independent of August 2d has a symposium on education. Two of the contributors deal with the question of religious instruction in the common schools. Prof. Edgar W. Work of the University of Wooster, Ohio, writes about "Education Without God," and the Rt. Rev. William Croswell Doane, D.D., LL.D, bishop of Albany, tells wherein he agrees with and opposes the Catholics.

Professor Work thinks that the drift of the time toward secular education "is no chance current, seeking whither it may go. There is an undercurrent bearing it on, which is perfectly conscious of itself, which knows whither it wishes to go, and is bent on making the way." After animadverting upon the theory of education held by Rousseau, and the ideas of German radicals and English and American Transcendentalists, Professor Work continues:

"Again, these theories mark a wide departure from the long-accepted definition of the purpose of education. The end of education is complete life. We hav the exact phrase, 'to prepare us for complete living,' from Herbert Spencer. Probably no one would desire to amend this definition. But now we are asked to subscribe to the doctrin that the preparation for complete living may wisely and safely omit, until the period of childhood is past at least, all reference to the Theistic beliefs and hopes of our common humanity and may satisfy the natural questionings of the child mind by the most indefinit, unsatisfying statements, such as the common experience of any thoughtful parent would repudiate, because he has found how constantly such answers are repudiated by the child. If we find little comfort in the scholastic extreme of Romanism which would wholly theologize the child life, there is none at all in this other extreme which has the cold hand of the naturalist upon it, and the chill of materialism about it."

The fundamental error in this reasoning is that it utterly ignores the fact that those who oppose religious instruction in the common schools hav no desire to interfere with parental freedom; rather, that is the very liberty for which they are contending. They wish to be left entirely free to giv their own children such information concerning religious theories and systems as they believe to be true and beneficial, and to leave to all other parents the religious education of their own offspring. This is the secular theory which Professor Work clearly perceives is at the bottom of all agitation against religious training in the public schools. While it is true that the end of education is "to prepare us for complete living," as Herbert Spencer aptly phrases it, it is equally true that no one would more quickly resent the deduction that the public school is capable of giving us this complete preparation than would Mr. Spencer himself. For instance, let us take the phrase which Professor Work has quoted and read it in connection with its context. Here it is:

"In what way to treat the body; in what way to treat the mind; in what way to manage our affairs; in what way to bring up a family; in what way to behave as a citizen; in what way to utilize those sources of happiness which nature supplies—how to use all our faculties to the greatest advantage of ourselvs and others—how to liv completely! And this being the great thing needful for us to learn, is, by consequence, the great thing which education has to teach. To prepare us for complete living is the function which education has to discharge."

This is that complete preparation for the battle of life which education is to giv us, and it is itself part of the battle of life. How preposterous to say or to intimate that Herbert Spencer supposes all this to be acquired in the few years which the child spends in the primary school, where he remains not more than the fourth part of each day! The truth is, all that the common school should attempt is instruction in those rudimentary branches which lie at the base of all other education, and which include respect for the equal rights of all. It cannot properly be an institute of theology. There is no agreement among the patrons of the schools concerning religious dogmas. Hence none can be taught therein without infringing the equal rights of some parents. Union of church and state is always unwise and dangerous, and religious teaching in the public schools constitutes union of church and state. No majority is justified, under the law of equal freedom, in compelling the children of any minority to receive instruction in religious doctrins to which the parents or guardians object.

There are a thousand things which parents may wish to teach their children that cannot be, except through gross injustice, included in the course of study of the public schools. The instruction and practice which will fit each youth for a special career must be found elsewhere. And most and the best part of his or her moral training will be received in other places that the public school, although no inconsiderable instruction of this kind can be given there, both directly and indirectly, and without the inculcation of dogma. That this can be and is done on a large scale is shown by the experience of France. The reader's attention is invited to the article, "Moral Education in France," that will be found on another page of this issue.

Bishop Doane is of the opinion that Protestants are not wise in retaining the Bible in the common schools. Supposing that the Catholic protest is made in good faith, he says now, as he said thirty years ago, that it should hav been heeded. He adds:

"Our theory ought to hav been that the reading of a few verses of the Bible could neither hurt nor help the children. It is folly to call it religious teaching. It is hardly true to call it a religious act. If we had, on this ground, abandoned the practice, we should hav taken out of their mouths, first, the demand for parochial schools, and next, the attempt to support these parochial schools with public money. It is not pertinent to discuss the first question; but one may say in passing that a far less clannish condition of things in this country would be brought about if all the children of the state who are to be educated free could be educated together. Since then the steps hav been absolutely serial and sequent. And the excuse which led to the use of parochial schools, with the insistence upon their use, led to the claim for money from the public school fund to support them. Granted that the common education of all American children in one great common school system is important, and it follows that it must not be destroyed by the attempt to introduce the teaching of definit religion into them. I claim that there is no other way of teaching religion than by the teaching of distinct, definit, dogmatic truth. Here I agree thoroughly with the Roman Catholics. But they do not like my dogma or believe in my doctrin any more than I like or believe in theirs (which is saying a good deal). And the only apparent conclusion is, that as there is no common dogma, therefore common schools must be left without the teaching of religion."

This is a very frank admission that the violation by Protestants of the basic American principle of separation of church and state has led to the present struggle over the school question, and has opened the way for Catholic teaching in the public schools if ever and wherever they become the dominant power. The various "patriotic" orders would do well to carefully ponder Bishop Doane's admissions and reasoning, with their direct and collateral deductions. It would be somewhat unseemly as well as unpatriotic to plunge the country into an internecine conflict in order to punish a "foreign church" for resenting the "un-American" acts of other churches.

So far Bishop Doane has been perfectly clear and understandable, but now he becomes ambiguous, and it is somewhat difficult to tell just what he means. This is his next paragraph:

"Religious teaching, the teaching of the great principles of religion; a careful avoidance of the contradictions and denials of much modern thought; the inculcation of the morality which rests upon the revelation of God; the recognition of the soul in a child, of the believing instinct which is inherent in all childhood—these there must be; just as in our government, which recognizes no religion, the fact of God is recognized and turned to account in securing the responsibility of those intrusted with government. But the non-religious character of the public schools as equally opposed to the irreligious or the ecclesiastical idea is of the essence of the system. They can be maintained in no other way. Hebrew and Roman Catholic, and Catholic and Protestant can all meet here on common grounds. Once touch the other ground, and there is nothing ahead but strife and rivalry and ruin."

Does this mean that the dogma of the existence of a God and the dogma of a soul and the dogma that God has made a revelation of a system of morals should be inculcated in the public schools? If this is not its meaning, what is it? If it does mean this, what becomes of the exclusion from the common schools of all dogmas which are not held in common by all the patrons of the schools? Assuredly, Bishop Doane knows that many tax-payers reject one or all of these dogmas. Hav they not equal citizen rights with Catholics, Protestants, and Hebrews? Is there to be a truce between these three chief divisions of the American religious world and a combination of their forces in order to foist upon the irreligious and non-religious supporters and patrons of the public schools the dogmas which the supernaturalists hold in common? Is "rivalry" to be eliminated so far as the educational question is concerned that the common enemy may be despoiled of his equal rights in the republic?

Bishop Doane refers to the oath taken by public officials upon their induction into office, to illustrate his contention that our government, "which recognizes no religion," nevertheless recognizes and turns to account the "fact of God," and therefore should (if we interpret him correctly) teach "the great principles of religion" in the common schools. But he forgets that, except in a few benighted states, the official may, if he prefers, make affirmation instead of taking the oath. The oath-recognition of the "fact of God" is not forced upon the dissenter. So Bishop Doane's illustration proves just the opposit of that which he employed it to show—the recognition of the "fact of God" should not be forced in the school upon the child of the Agnostic or the Atheist.

Our Episcopal friend closes his article with these words:

"It certainly must be noted that the meaning of all this is that every Christian church, every Christian parent, every faithful Hebrew, must more than ever see to it that in the home and in the church and in the synagog, the child is rooted and grounded in the tenets of his faith."

We will add that "every Christian church, every Christian parent, every faithful Hebrew," must teach in the home, in the church, and in the synagog, "the great principles of religion" as well as "the tenets of his faith," if they are taught at all. They hav no more right in the common schools than has the Bible, which Bishop Doane is willing to exclude.

An Atheist, Not Atheists.

The American Sentinel, the Adventist anti-theocratic paper of this city, quotes from the Ironclad Age, as follows:

"At Wilmington, N. C., one man sued another. As the plaintiff arose to testify, objection was made on account of his disbelief in a god. After some consideration by the judge the man was allowed to testify on condition that he declared his belief in a god. To the great surprise of all present he did so. But as his non-religious views were well known, he prejudiced his case to such an extent that no conviction can be had. And such is our boasted religious liberty. · · ·

"We trust that the time will come when the cheerful doctrin of eternal torture will no longer be bellowed forth at camp-meetings and other godly assemblages by insane sensational rascals. We trust that the time will come when such work will be interdicted by law."

Here are the comments of our Christian contemporary:

"In view of the second paragraph quoted, what right has the Ironclad Age to find fault that a witness is required to avow his belief in God before being permitted to testify? None whatever. Of course the North Carolina practice is wrong. Every man ought to be permitted to testify in a court of justice under the pains of perjury without any reference to his religious belief, and without any prejudice against him because of his faith or lack of faith; but the state of affairs that the Ironclad Age hopes to see would be much worse than the evil complained of. The National Reformers would overthrow the first amendment to the Constitution in the interest of what they imagin is Christianity; the Atheists of the Ironclad Age school would equally overthrow it in the interests of the blackest kind of Infidelity, the very midnight of unbelief. There is small difference between the intolerance of Atheism and the intolerance of so-called Christianity; both are utterly destructiv to soul liberty, and both are from the enemy of all righteousness. That this is true is evident from the fact that the Ironclad Age takes its stand with the enemies of the Constitution which declares that 'Congress shall make no law concerning an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.'"

The American Sentinel is perfectly right in its criticism of the Ironclad Age. The Sentinel's position is absolutely impregnable, and we deeply regret that any Infidel should hav made such a rebuke necessary. However pernicious we may deem any Christian doctrin or method of propaganda to be, we must stand firmly for the right to differ. That is the very heart and soul of Freethought. And we are surprised that the American Sentinel should hav based such a sweeping accusation of Atheism upon the utterance of one Atheist. Neither Atheism nor Freethought logically demands or permits the suppression of opposing theories and beliefs. Every Freethinker who knows why he is a Freethinker will antagonize the position unfortunately taken by the Ironclad Age. Many years ago the present editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in commenting upon criticisms made by the father of the present editor of the Ironclad Age against D. M. Bennett, asked this question: "Is there no merit—no bravery—in fighting for another's right to differ from you?" referring to Mr. Bennett's championship of the civil rights of E. H. Heywood, whose social theories he did not accept. It is right here that the typical Freethinker must part company with the typical Christian. The Christian church holds to the doctrin of exclusiv salvation, and that doctrin has made organized Christianity the persecutor, torturer, and executioner of the dissenter. The Freethinker repudiates the doctrin, and he cannot, logically, use the instrumentalities which the church has employed in the attempt to force universal acceptance of its creed to the end that souls might be saved from an eternal hell. Christians like the editors of the American Sentinel are out of harmony with historical Christianity, for they would leave all men free to settle their own accounts with the supernatural powers. Freethinkers who advocate the suppression by law of revivals are out of harmony with historical Freethought and with the genius of Liberalism.

Would it not be well for the Gleaner to name the fields from which it gleans? Or does it think that it will be permanently benefited by having credited to itself the articles which it has taken without credit?

Since last acknowledgment the following named Liberals hav become subscribers to "Four Hundred Years of Freethought": Marcus Klein, Michigan; Charles Lambert, Missouri; Daniel T. Ames, New York; P. N. Wiis, Washington.

There has been introduced in the Constitutional Convention of this state a proposed amendment forbidding idolatry. Is this aimed at the Chinese or the Catholics? Or is it intended to make the worship of the Dollar a penal offense? Anyway, it is just as legitimate to enforce one dogma as another; we already hav laws to compel the observance of a holy day.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week urge Attorney-General Richard Olney, Washington, D. C., and District Attorney W. C. Perry, Topeka, Kan., to withdraw or nolle prosse the case against J. B. Wise, Clay Center, Kan., who has been indicted for sending to Rev. H. B. Vennum a postal card upon which was written a passage from the Bible. Mr. Wise is booked for trial next October. Make your letters short, clear, and respectful. Do not make attacks upon the Bible. State the question and stick to the text. Show that if Mr. Wise is convicted the Bible societies also may be punished and the Bible shut out of the mails.

The "International Sabbath Observance League," a band of impudent meddlers, tried to prevent a match game of base-ball at Chicago last Sunday. Judge Horton granted an injunction, which was dissolved later after long argument by counsel. This is good, so far as it goes, but an organization is needed which will make it its business to meet this "International" gang of Sunday road agents at every point attacked and show it that it does not own the courts nor the free people of the United States.

"The missionaries in Africa count the work of one woman worth that of twelve men, since women can go anywhere, even among the fiercest tribes. Their motivs are never questioned, and they are listened to with the greatest respect."—Church at Home and Abroad.

Better not Christianize Africa then, for nothing is more certain than that women cannot go everywhere in this Christian land without having their motivs questioned and being insulted and put in jeopardy. What sort of a reception would women missionaries from Africa get in many parts of the United States, city and country alike?

The Scottish Leader givs to the world a curious comparison. The report to the Assembly by the Commission on the Religious Condition of the People embodies some tables of illegitimacy. Dr. Cramond, at a meeting of the commission, produced a scale in inches showing the comparativ state of illegitimacy of the three kingdoms. Ireland was represented by a line one and three eighths inches long, England by one five inches long, and Banffshire, Scotland, by one sixteen inches long. From this it would appear either that race has more to do with such results than religion and education, or that the grosser religious superstition is more productiv of regularity in sex relations than is a comparativly enlightened belief.

According to the Rev. Dr. L. H. Mills, who writes in the Nineteenth Century of the relation of Christianity to Zoroastrianism, the doctrin of immortality was almost entirely unknown to the Jews before the time of Isaiah. He says that "it pleased the divine power to reveal some of the most important articles of our Catholic creed first to the Zoroastrians, and then through their literature to the Jews and ourselvs." "The orthodox Jew was, in fact, a Sadducee, denying the existence of a future state, while the Pharisee (signifying Farsee or Persian) was simply a convert to Mazda worship—a Zoroastrian." Also from the Mazda worship came the doctrin that evil is chiefly its own punishment and virtue its own reward even in the great reckoning. The idea of revelation—that is, of miracle—is gradually giving way to the conception of evolution—that is, of development, growth.

The Letter-Writing Corps is making itself felt. One of its members sends us copies of letters that hav passed between himself and the American Book Company of this city. The company evidently thought that it was charged with having put theological dogmas into the school books which it publishes, and it is anxious for specifications. Our correspondent thereupon writes us that we "must be sure of our premises before firing on the target." We were. The American Book Company was not charged with having offended. It was stated by us that efforts were being put forth by the Covenanters to induce it to offend, and the action we took was purely precautionary and intended to be preventiv. We printed this from the Christian Reformer:

"Dr. H. H. George · · · reported that he had corresponded with the leading school book publishers, viz.: Ginn & Co., Boston; Potter & Co., Philadelphia; and the American Book Co., New York."

This was for the purpose of getting Sabbath school observance doctrins into the school books issued by these firms. Ginn & Co. "thought it a grand idea;" Potter & Co. "could see no objection to it;" while the American Book Company "did not know that it would be expedient." The Corps was asked to write to all these houses in order to counteract the influence of the Sundayites. Our correspondent in his second letter to the company should hav quoted the paragraph from which we hav made the above extract, that his target might see that there was no misrepresentation of its position.

The Society for the Promotion and Protection of Cruelty to Children still livs to try the patience of humanitarians and furnish comfortable berths for its officials. One of its latest performances is the arrest of a girl of twelve years of age for the offense of selling newspapers on the streets. Her parents are very poor and were sick, and her small earnings helped a little to keep them together and starvation from their door. She was turned over to the care of the society aforesaid, which means that she was imprisoned for trying to earn an honest living. Her father was also arrested, if we are not mistaken. The World and also some writers to the dailies denounced the outrage, whereupon Elbridge T. Gerry, president of the society, and probable Tammany candidate for mayor, sends a letter to the World, in which he makes an abortiv attempt to defend the persecution of the girl. Judging by a part of his communication, it might be well to change the name of the organization to "The Society for the Dicouragement of Self-Help and the Cultivation of Mendicancy." He says that if the family was in a starving condition the case was a proper one for the consideration of the "New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor." He also speaks of the "speedy assistance" which can be obtained by such a procedure. Aside from the fact that a really needy person could easily starve to death before the cumbersome machinery of any of the charity organizations could be gotten in motion, it is just such possibly well-meaning but red-tape-mad "philanthropists" who are responsible for a large percentage of the helplessness and abject poverty which curse our modern civilization. Instead of teaching people to help themselvs, instead of making it an object for them to try to "hoe their own row," instead of keeping out of their way and giving them as fair a field as is now obtainable, these charity marplots get laws enacted that will help make poor people poorer, and so giv further excuse for their own corporate existence. Then they and their official abettors see to it that whatever of relf-respect is left in these poor people, who are striving with more or less earnestness and hope to keep on their own feet, is crushed out of them in one way and another. So long as a family is self-sustaining there is always a chance, however small, that its members will see better days, but once get it to depend upon alms and it will take its place permanently in the ranks of the spongers. Gerry would send this girl to a charity organization for the bread that she was willing to earn by her own exertions, and he says he does this to keep her from "vice." Oh, the cant of that!

The "Age of Reason" Marches On.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's Missionary Scheme is becoming so popular a movement that we are surprised that somebody did not think of it before. The appended letters addressed to this office show how it is received:

"It occurs to me that my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER is somewhat overdue, and in consequence I inclose $5—$3 for renewal, and the balance as follows: Send the 'Age of Reason' to the following parties (who are all Christians, and who will not fail to ascribe their reception to the agency of your humble servant, nor neglect to warm up the vials of their wrath for his benefit) and the residue you can turn to any purpose of propagauda you choose."—E. O. ROSCOE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

"Send to following persons 'Age of Reason' for inclosed $1.25."—ASA SMITH, Cadmus, Kan.

Wise vs. Vennum.

TO THE EDITOR: I am very glad indeed to know that you are not idle in my case. That's right; show it up in its true light, as it is beginning to open the people's eyes. Even the Rev Mr. Vennum is looking at the case in a different aspect; and is saying that he is now sorry that he sent the postal card to the officials to hav me arrested, and acknowledging that the Bible is an obscene book. He knows very well that my purpose in sending the card was to get his opinion on that passage of scripture. It was the object in our religious controversy to obtain the opinions of each other. He started the religious discussion The first seven or eight months that he was in Industry he preached every Sunday evening in the town-hall, and had something to say about "Infidelity" (as he would call Freethought), and misrepresented the Freethinkers. He kept it up so long that I finally told him he was making assertions he could not prove. I went to his meetings nearly every Sunday evening. He remarked that he knew what he was talking about, and paid no attention to what I said. His object in slandering Freethinkers was to scare people into the church. He had only half a dozen members when he came there, and has not any more now. Recently the best paying as well as the most energetic member became so disgusted with him that he and his wife left that church for good.

Of late the preacher has said less on Infidelity, and is working another scheme. He now gets up entertainments for the benefit of his God and the church, such as shows, literary amusements, ice cream socials, oyster suppers, in fact, any kind of a worldly amusement that will bring money into the church, and "all for the Lord." But the majority of the thinking class of people hav got so disgusted that they won't hav anything to do with him.

Dr. Renner, Bergers, and other Freethinkers hav challenged him for a discussion on the religious question. But he will not debate. The only time he will argue scripture is when he is in the coward's castle, and nobody dare make a reply.

Most of the people around Industry are glad to know that you are enlisted in this fight. A man told me the other day that Vennum had been trying to trap me for the past two years. It was not the postal card that offended him, so much as my advocacy of Liberalism and selling of Freethought books in and around Industry, for wherever the people read Freethought literature the preacher's dupes are likely to be scarce. Vennum and his supporters hav been angry enough to kill me if they dared, for traveling over the country selling "Infidel trash," as he designates it, and "poisoning the people's minds" with it. He said long ago that he would hav to put a stop to it, as it was hurting what he calls his "preaching business." He preaches for the Albrights, or "Evangelical" denomination, as they now call themselvs. He also autioneers public sales. He now also tries to make the people believe that he didn't hav anything to do in arresting me.

W. C. Perry, United States attorney, of Topeka, Kan., sent me an exact copy of the postal card, and I sent it to Mr. Ed. W. Chamberlain, New York, last Monday, as he told me to do so.

Moral Education in France.

Lack of acquaintance with facts leads to wild assertions like that of Canon Gregory, that morals cannot be taught without religion. In all the French public schools this is done. Although the church, the Bible, and the supernaturalism founded on them are discarded, reason and conscience are appealed to, and the duties of humanity and citizenship carefully inculcated. Indeed, it is safe to say that far more attention is devoted to ethical culture in the godless schools of France than in the Christian schools of England. In the "Normal Plan of Education," the official code, it is laid down that morality must be as regularly taught as any other branch of study; and, although it designates only reason and conscience as the sources of the system of morals, books are permitted to be used in which Theism is recognized, but, necessarily, in the most general terms. Two of the most popular manuals used in the schools are Liard's "Lectures Morales et Litteraires," and Jost and Braeunig's "Lectures Practiques." These works are wholly secular. They explain and emphasize the duties to one's self, to one's neighbor, and to the state. Duties to self include those toward the body, as cleanliness, temperance, etc. Duties toward the neighbor are summed up as truth, justice, and love. Duty to the country, or patriotism, is, perhaps, made too much of; but the schools are regarded as state schools, and the children's love and devotion are evoked toward that larger corporate being, France, of which they are a part. Matthew Arnold, in his last report, told how a child, asked "To whom do you owe all you are enjoying here—this fine schoolroom, these pictures, this splendid city, all that givs security, comfort, and pleasure to you? Who givs it all to you?" replied, not to God, but "Eh bien, c'est le pays"—"It is my country." Let it be noted that while the French child is turned out a trained citizen, ready for the work of life, the cost of education in "Infidel" France is but 18s. 1d. per head; while in London, where the child is less adequately educated and there is constant squabbling over the religious question, the cost is fully three times that amount.—London Freethinker.

THE Freethinkers of Kansas will hold a convention in Topeka, Kan., September 6th-9th. Preparations are being made to hav it a grand success. Excellent speaking and singing will be the distinctiv features of the occasion. Many Freethinkers—Agnostics, Spiritualists, and Liberals of other shades—hav signified their intention of being present and participating in the deliberations of the convention. Kansas is having good crops this year and, notwithstanding the calamity of the great strike, its people are hopeful and look forward to better times in the not distant future. W. S. Bell is now lecturing in Kansas, helping to prepare the minds of the Liberals for the coming intellectual feast. His address is 114 East Fourth street, Topeka, Kan.

Freethought and Secular Notes from England.

GENERAL ACTIVITY.

Although we are now in the hight of summer, there is no lack of interesting questions before the public. Secular and Freethought lectures are being continued, both in our halls and also in the open air; and the different speakers hav every reason to be satisfied with their attentiv audiences. Contributions to the "Foote Testimonial Fund" are still coming in, and it is proposed to close it at the end of this month, when the presentation will be made to the president of the National Secular Society. In my next "Notes" I will giv particulars of the event, which will no doubt be of a very interesting character.

While the clergy are activ in endeavoring to devise some plan to stop the "rapid progress of skepticism," they are all at loggerheads amongst themselvs as to the kind of religious instruction that should be incorporated with our national education. The Freethinkers and Secularists are fully alive to the importance of making the most of the opportunity which this split in the Christian camp offers. Perhaps the old proverb that, when certain persons fall out, honest men will get their due, will be verified by the answer that will ultimately be given to the question, Shall the Bible be taught in our public schools? At any rate, the National Secular Society is preparing to fight for direct Secular representation on the school board. It will be a hard-fought battle between now and next November, when the election for a new board will take place.

A thoroughly democratic budget has just passed its third reading in the House of Commons. This is not the place to giv details of the Finance bill, as the budget is termed, but it may be stated that the principle of the bill is to transfer more fairly the burden of taxation from the poor to the rich, which is a legislativ act as just as it is desirable.

The claims of labor are becoming more and more recognized in England by the "powers that be," and general education has received an impetus that must prove a lasting blessing to the entire community. Altogether the spirit of reform is activ amongst us and, personally, I am inspired with reasonable hopes for the future of the Old Country.

DEATH OF THOMAS SLATER.

Many of the English residents in the New World will, doubtless, remember the late Thomas Slater, of Bury, Lancashire. During the latter years of his life he resided at the Secular Hall, Leicester. He died last month after a long and severe illness, and his remains were cremated at Manchester. A more honest and plain-spoken worker in our movement never served the cause of Freethought. He was, during most of his career, a firm believer in co-operation, in which association he took an activ part. For over twenty years it was my privilege to enjoy his warm friendship, and he always appeared to me to be a consistent Secularist and a noble man.

SABBATARIAN BIGOTRY.

In my last "Notes" I mentioned that up to that time "The Lord's Day Observance Society" had contented itself with mere "threats." Since then, however, they hav brought an action against the Leeds Sunday Society and hav obtained a verdict, but in their case the victory gained will, I believe, prove to them worse that a defeat, for it will certainly hasten the repeal of the silly statute of George III, upon which the action was based. The judge, in summing up, told the jury that their duty was to enforce the law; but if there was not an act of Parliament this would hav been a wanton interference with the liberty of the subject. The jury, in finding a verdict for the plaintiffs, added that the statute ought to be repealed. But the fact remains that in this country of enlightenment it is possible for a band of bigots to invoke the law successfully against the reasonable and sensible exercises of other people, and to see those people mulcted in penalties. Special efforts are being made to obtain a repeal of this stupid and unjust act of Parliament. So long as it remains unrepealed one who spends his Sunday in such fashion as he deems right is always liable to tyrannical persecution. Surely this cannot go on. There are not ten people in a hundred to-day who would approve of the fanatical folly of it. People will make Sunday an endurable day to liv through, and unless the paid and unpaid professors of religion acknowledge it, so much the worse for religion.

THE BISHOPS AGAIN.

The bishop of Rochester, speaking in convocation the other day, warned the rich and cultured classes against the misuse of Sunday for the purposes of mere amusement, but he proposed a resolution implying that an increasing number of people desire the reasonable use of libraries, picture-galleries, and newsrooms. On that the bishop of Exeter declared roundly that the two prohibitions that came down direct from Eden were the Sunday use of picture-galleries and marriage with a deceased wife's sister. This is indeed amusing, even from a bishop. We should like to hear where in the fabled garden of Eden the Sunday use of pictures was prohibited. And we surely think that if Adam and Even were ever alone in paradise the deceased wife's sister bill was yet to come into the region of practical politics. The bishop of Rochester was quite right in saying there is an increased demand for the use of picture-galleries, etc. This is proved by the Sunday opening of the City Art Gallery in London, which has been a very great success. An average of 544 persons per hour visited the gallery on the Sundays it was open, as against 401 on week days. The class of visitors were mostly artisans and clerks, just the people whose work does not allow them to go on week days, and whose only chance to enjoy the beauties of art treasures is on a Sunday.

CHRISTIAN IDEA OF MORALITY.

Christians hav queer ideas of what constitutes morality. Secularists hav always supposed that truth, sobriety, industry, and sincerity were the highest indications of ethical culture. But evidently the dean of Norwich does not think so. These virtues, he admits, may be good, but they are not the best; and in his opinion, "the morals of the nation are highest when tithes are most willingly paid." So he said in his recent sermon in aid of the Poor Clergy Relief Society. It has often been urged as a reproach against the clergy that so many of them think more of the fatness of a living than of its opportunities for good; but one scarcely expected a dean to proclaim so plainly that the highest morality was not to be found in personal conduct but in paying the parson. If a Freethinker had said that the highest morality consisted in paying the fees of the Secular lecturers, we no doubt should hav heard much about "gross materialism" and the selfishness of skepticism.

ATHEISM IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Committee of the House of Lords hav published the result of their deliberation upon the question of "Betterment," which they say is a kind of wild justice. It is in their opinion an impracticable virtue. It is not in itself unjust, but it becomes unjust in its application. This is the last word of the aristocrat in politics. Abstract rights when translated into action become concrete wrongs. We will grant you anything in theory, say they, but when it comes to practice, if your theory touches us or our friends, justice becomes injustice. The principle of betterment is just, but its rigid and vigorous application is unjust. This is the sort of moral leakage for which the English aristocracy is famous. The London Star comments upon the conclusion of the committee thus: "Englishmen are accustomed to regard the chamber called upper as the bulwark of religion and all the moralities. But that is an error. Aristocracy is the worst kind of immorality. It sticks at nothing in the way of self-preservation. And in the present instance the lords hav arraigned the fundamental doctrin of Christianity, namely, the theory of divine providence. The bench of bishops preach this dogma, and the lords in their velvety pews mumble out easy acquiescence. If providence looks after every detail of life, surely the just thing is also the practicable if not the pleasant thing. A just, omnipotent, and omniscient director would not make justice impossible. But the lords fly in the face of their maker and say, 'Betterment is just, but it can't be done. The principle is right, but the application is wrong.' We confess that this looks like rank Atheism. We think that the bishops should look to the purity of their doctrinal ermine. The tendency of our aristocracy is toward Atheism. Not the progressivs but the peers are the true Infidels. How can we believe in the existence of a God who makes virtue impossible? Yet the patrician theory of betterment presents this conception of providence. It is abundantly clear that the aristocracy is a power which makes for Atheism. It makes a fool of both God and man."

A NON-RELIGIOUS COMMUNITY.

Mr. Bakewell's account of New Zealand, which recently appeared in the Nineteenth Century, has terribly alarmed the orthodox Christians here. They are sadly afraid that the world is likely to behold in the course of a generation or two a large community of civilized men and women without any religious belief whatever. The following are the words of Mr. Bakewell that hav given the pious folk so much anxiety: "A whole generation has now grown to manhood, to the majority of whom the simplest facts of the early history of Christianity are as unknown as the facts of early Chinese history; they never read the Bible at school; and there is no such book at home; they never go to a Sunday-school or to church except to look after some girl; and they are as destitute of any religious sentiment as a horse or a cow. They are not heathen—they hav no religion at all. They would not call themselvs Agnostics, because they do not know the meaning of the word; but in the literal sense they are Agnostics." If this description, or anything like it, be correct, the young New Zealanders to whom it applies certainly do not deserve to be called Agnostics, unless the word be altered to "don't know, and don't care;" for the genuin Agnostic cares a great deal, and is always striving to obtain additional knowledge.

RELIGIOUS FANATICISM.

The Salvation Army hav been holding a festival at the Crystal Palace and during the proceedings religious fanaticism was at its hight. About five hundred wild enthusiasts were brought to London from almost every nation on earth, and fine specimens they were of mind-diseased dupes. Some of them carried nativ tomahawks and spears, others sang to the accompaniment of banjos, while those from India "yelled and shrieked and danced to the discordant music of their own band. They swirled round and round, and jumped and sang with an abandon that would hav made Mrs. Grundy blush to the roots of her hair." Such displays of barbaric fanaticism are a reproach to our national intelligence. Religion in this case reduces its victims to a state of savagery, robbing them of their reason and making them ready tools in the hands of those who thrive upon ignorance and imbecility.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT.

The labor movement, in which many Freethinkers are deeply concerned, is making rapid strides in the Old Country. It is headed by advanced minds who either repudiate or ignore all kinds of theology. The government is also activ in the matter, as may be seen from the report of the royal commission on labor just published. It has proved one of the costliest literary works issued since printing began. The money actually expended in its preparation exceeds £47,000, and will probably reach £50,000 before the account is closed.

THE PROPER USE OF WEALTH.

Mr. Ludwig Mond, partner with Mr. Brunner, M.P., in one of the greatest chemical manufacturing firms of this country, has just made a noble use of his great wealth. At the last monthly meeting of the Royal Institution it was announced that Mr. Mond, who is the owner of the large freehold house, No. 20 Albemarle street, London, close to the buildings of the Royal Institution, formerly the town mansion of the earl of Albemarle, has made a gift of this spacious tenement in fee simple to the institution. He will himself, moreover, bear all the expenses of converting the premises from their present residential condition into a fully equipped establishment for chemical and physical research to be styled "The Davy-Faraday Research Laboratory." This alone would be constituted a truly magnificent gift to science, but the generous donor goes farther. He will also endow the new establishment—first with a standing revenue sufficient to meet all yearly expenses of rates, taxes, maintenance, etc., and secondly with what will obviously need to be even a larger provision, a fund, namely, adequate to provide salaries and incidental expenses of a trained scientific staff, whose time and services will be devoted to working the new institution in a complete and continuous manner. If more wealth were devoted to such objects as the above and less to the teaching of theology the world would be the gainer. Science is truly the providence of man, while theology has proved itself a curse to humanity.

DAVID HUME.

Where David Hume lived in Edinburgh, someone ironically chalked on his wall, "Saint David's," and the street is now known by that name. He was thus made a "saint" while living, and, according to the following, he is now provided for after his death. Dr. John Brown, author of the "Brownian System of Physic," on passing the monument of David Hume in the Calton burying-ground, Edinburgh, observed to a mason who was laying a pavement stone for it, "Friend, this is a strong and massy building; but how do you think the honest gentleman can get out at the resurrection?" The mason archly replied, "Sir, I hav reserved that point, for I hav put the key under the door."

PROFESSOR HUXLEY AND THE GHOST.

Mr. Andrew Lang, who has written upon almost every subject, has now published his thoughts upon the famous story of "The Cock Lane Ghost," in which, it will be remembered, the Goliah of English literature, Dr. Samuel Johnson, expressed his belief a hundred years ago. In this publication Mr. Lang attacks Professor Huxley, who replies thus in a letter to the London Times: "If, after death. I am fated to take part in Cock-lane pranks, and Sludge séances, I must put up with the degradation. but 'the offer of immortality, handicapped with Cocklanean conditions,' is one which I should decline with thanks."

INTERESTING ITEMS.

Our new lord chief-justice, long known as Sir Charles Russell, the eminent lawyer and advocate of home rule, is the first Roman Catholic who has been raised to that position since our great revolution. The spirit of toleration grows wider and broader every day, and the extension of social rights goes on at a speed unknown in any previous generation.

The increase of madness in this country is rather alarming. We learn from the report of the Lunacy Commissioners, which is just published, that there were on the 1st of January last 92,000 lunatics in England and Wales, and that this number is 2,245 in excess of the number a year previous. This is the largest annual increase yet recorded, the average annual increase for the last ten years being 1,354.

A Birmingham paper recently gave publicity to the fact that the works of "Ouida," with those of Fielding and Smollett, had been rigorously excluded from the free library at Aston, a suburb of Birmingham. The same paper prints the following letter from the lady novelist: "I am gratified to be excommunicated with Fielding and Smollett. It is lamentable that such bigotry should exist. Yours sincerely, OUIDA."

A manifesto addressed to the "Christians of London" on religious instruction in board schools, and signed by several members of the London School Board, has been issued. It says that London is face to face with a very grave crisis and impresses upon the public the duty and the responsibility of energetically resisting the attempt by the sacerdotal party to overturn the compromise of 1871. There is no doubt of the issue, as the sacerdotal party is as comparativly small in numbers as it is persistent in effort. It makes up in audacity what it lacks in numerical strength. It must, however, be met, resisted, and scattered.

The countess of Shaftesbury has written a public letter calling attention to the Women's Christian Education League, whose operations hav now been extended to every division of the London school board area, and appealing for help, moral and material, in a work the importance and urgency of which become clearer every day. The letter continues: "The issue to be ultimately determined is between definit religious teaching and Secularism pure and simple, for the sort of undenominational teaching which shall be equally suitable to Christians and non-Christians will satisfy nobody and will in the end result in discrediting religious teaching altogether."

Attention was drawn, during the discussion of the army estimates the other evening in the House of Commons, to the fact that the Duke of Cambridge gets, inclusiv of £4,500 as commander-in-chief, £18,741 47s. 2d.—the bulk of it as a prince of the blood, but some of it as colonel of the Grenadier Guards. This appears to me to be nothing less than disgraceful. The "services" which the duke renders to the state are worse than useless, for he is a persistent opponent of all reforms. And this outrageous extravagance is maintained while every week heart-rending cases of "Deaths from Starvation" are recorded. This, be it remembered, is going on in "Christian England."

The education department hav issued their annual report for the year 1893. It is signed by Lord Rosebery and Mr. Acland. It is the chronicle of a very successful year's work. The acceptance of the fee grant by nearly all the schools has rendered elementary education practicallv gratuitous throughout England and Wales, and the influence on the attendance of the scholars has been great. In 1892 5,006,979 children were on the register; in 1893 the numbers had risen to 5,126,373. The average attendance in 1892 was 3,870,774, and last year it had risen to 4,100,300. There are now 2,392 school boards, covering almost exactly two-thirds of the population. Out of 29,000,000 the school boards now hav jurisdiction over 19,620,379. CHARLES WATTS.

Ingersoll on Suicide.

From the New York World.

I do not know whether self-killing is on the increase or not. If it is, then there must be, on the average, more trouble, more sorrow, more failure, and consequently, more people are driven to despair. In civilized life there is a great struggle, great competition, and many fail. To fail in a great city is like being wrecked at sea. In the country a man has friends. He can get a little credit, a little help, but in the city it is different. The man is lost in the multitude. In the roar of the streets his cry is not heard. Death becomes his only friend. Death promises release from want, from hunger and pain, and so the poor wretch lays down his burden, dashes it from his shoulders and falls asleep.

To me all this seems very natural. The wonder is that so many endure and suffer to the natural end, that so many nurse the spark of life in huts and prisons, keep it and guard it through years of misery and want; support it by beggary, by eating the crust found in the gutter, and to whom it only givs days of weariness and nights of fear and dread. Why should the man, sitting amid the wreck of all he had, the loved ones dead, friends lost, seek to lengthen, to preserve his life? What can the future have for him?

Under many circumstances a man has the right to kill himself. When life is of no value to him, when he can be of no real assistance to others, why should a man continue? When he is of no benefit, when he is a burden to those he loves, why should he remain? The old idea was that "God" made us and placed us here for a purpose. and that it was our duty to remain until he called us. The world is outgrowing this absurdity. What pleasure can it give "God" to see a man devoured by a cancer? To see the quivering flesh slowly eaten? To see the nerves throbbing with pain? Is this a festival for "God"? Why should the poor wretch stay and suffer? A little morphine would give him sleep—the agony would be forgotten and he would pass unconsciously from happy dreams to painless death.

If "God" determines all births and deaths, of what use is medicine, and why should doctors defy, with pills and powders, the decrees of "God"? No one, except a few insane, act now according to this childish superstition. Why should a man surrounded by flames in the midst of a burning building, from which there is no escape, hesitate to put a bullet through his brain or a dagger in his heart? Would it give "God" pleasure to see him burn? When did the man lose the right of self-defense?

So, when a man has committed some awful crime, why should he stay and ruin his family and friends? Why should he add to the injury? Why should he live, filling his days and nights, and the days and nights of others, with grief and pain, with agony and tears?

Why should a man sentenced to imprisonment for life hesitate to still his heart? The grave is better than the cell. Sleep is sweeter than the ache of toil. The dead have no masters.

So the poor girl, betrayed and deserted, the door of home closed against her, the faces of friends averted, no hand that will help, no eye that will soften with pity, the future an abyss filled with monstrous shapes of dread and fear, her mind racked by fragments of thoughts like clouds broken by storm, pursued, surrounded by the serpents of remorse, flying from horrors too great to bear, rushes with joy through the welcome door of death.

Undoubtedly there are many cases of perfectly justifiable suicide—cases in which not to end life would be a mistake, sometimes almost a crime.

As to the necessity of death, each must decide for himself. And if a man honestly decides that death is best—best for him and others—and acts upon the decision, why should he be blamed?

Certainly the man who kills himself is not a physical coward. He may have lacked moral courage, but not physical. It may be said that some men fight duels because they are afraid to decline. They are between two fires—the chance of death and the certainty of dishonor, and they take the chance of death. So the Christian martyrs were, according to their belief, between two fires—the flames of the fagot that could burn but for a few moments and the fires of God that were eternal. And they chose the flames of the fagot.

Men who fear death to that degree that they will bear all the pains and pangs that nerves can feel rather than die cannot afford to call the suicide a coward. It does not seem to me that Brutus was a coward or that Seneca was. Surely Antony had nothing left to live for. Cato was not a craven. He acted on his judgment. So with hundreds of others who felt that they had reached the end—that the journey was done, the voyage was over, and, so feeling, stopped. It seems certain that the man who commits suicide, who "does the thing that stops all other deeds, that shackles accident and bolts up change," is not lacking in physical courage.

If men had the courage they would not linger in prisons, in alms-houses, in hospitals, they would not bear the pangs of incurable disease, the stains of dishonor, they would not liv in filth and want, in poverty and hunger, neither would they wear the chain of slavery. All this can be accounted for only by the fear of death or "of something after."

Seneca, knowing that Nero intended to take his life, had no fear. He knew that he could defeat the emperor. He knew that "at the bottom of every river, in the coil of every rope, on the point of every dagger, Liberty sat and smiled." He knew that it was his own fault if he allowed himself to be tortured to death by his enemy. He said: "There is this blessing, that while life has but one entrance, it has exits innumerable; and as I choose the house in which I live, the ship in which I will sail, so will I choose the time and manner of my death."

To me this is not cowardly, but manly and noble.

Under the Roman law persons found guilty of certain offenses were not only destroyed but their blood was polluted, and their children became outcasts. If, however, they died before conviction, their children were saved. Many committed suicide to save their babes. Certainly they were not cowards. Although guilty of great crimes, they had enough of honor, of manhood, left to save their innocent children. This was not cowardice.

Without doubt many suicides are caused by insanity. Men lose their property. The fear of the future overpowers them. Things lose proportion, they lose poise and balance, and in a flash, a gleam of frenzy, kill themseves. The disappointed in love, broken in heart—the light fading from their lives—seek the refuge of death.

Those who take their lives in painful, barbarous ways—who mangle their throats with broken glass, dash themselves from towers and roofs, take poisons that torture like the rack—such persons must be insane. But those who take the facts into account, who weigh the arguments for and against, and who decide that death is best—the only good—and then resort to reasonable means, may be, so far as I can see, in full possession of their minds.

Life is not the same to all—to some a blessing, to some a curse, to some not much in any way. Some leave it with unspeakable regret, some with the keenest joy, and some with indifference.

Religion, or the decadence of religion, has a bearing upon the number of suicides. The fear of "God," of judgment, of eternal pain, will stay the hand, and people so believing will suffer here until relieved by natural death. A belief in eternal agony beyond the grave will cause such believers to suffer the pangs of this life. When there is no fear of the future, when death is believed to be a dreamless sleep, men have less hesitation about ending their lives. On the other hand, orthodox religion has driven millions to insanity. It has caused parents to murder their children and many thousands to destroy themselves and others.

It seems probable that all real, genuine orthodox believers who kill themselves must be insane, and to such a degree that their belief is forgotten. "God" and hell are out of their minds.

I am satisfied that many who commit suicide are insane, many are in the twilight or dusk of insanity, and many are perfectly sane.

The law we hav in this state making it a crime to attempt suicide is cruel and absurd and calculated to increase the number of successful suicides. When a man has suffered so much, when he has been so persecuted and pursued by disaster that he seeks the rest and sleep of death, why should the state add to the sufferings of that man? A man seeking death, knowing that he will be punished if he fails, will take extra pains and precautions to make death certain.

This law was born of superstition, passed by thoughtlessness, and enforced by ignorance and cruelty.

When the house of life becomes a prison, when the horizon has shrunk and narrowed to a cell, and when the convict longs for the libertv of death, why should the effort to escape be regarded as a crime?

Of course, I regard life from a natural point of view. I do not take gods, heavens, and hells into account. My horizon is the known, and my estimate of life is based upon what I know of life here in this world. People should not suffer for the sake of supernatural beings or for other worlds or the hopes and fears of some future state. Our joys, our sufferings, and our duties are here.

The law of New York about the attempt to commit suicide and the law as to divorce are about qual. Both are idiotic. Law cannot prevent suicide. Those who have lost all fear of death care nothing for law and its penalties. Death is liberty, absolute and eternal.

We should remember that nothing happens but the natural. Back of every suicide and every attempt to commit suicide is the natural and efficient cause. Nothing happens by chance. In this world the facts touch each other. There is no space between—no room for chance. Given a certain heart and brain, certain conditions, and suicide is the necessary result. If we wish to prevent suicide we must change conditions. We must by education, by invention, by art, by civilization, add to the value of the average life. We must cultivate the brain and heart—do away with false pride and false modesty. We must become generous enough to help our fellows without degrading them. We must make industry—useful work of all kinds—honorable. We must mingle a little affection with our charity—a little fellowship. We should allow those who have sinned to really reform. We should not think only of what the wicked have done, but we should think of what we have wanted to do. People do not hate the sick. Why should they despise the mentally weak—the diseased in brain?

Our actions are the fruit, the result, of circumstances—of conditions—and we do as we must. This great truth should fill the heart with pity for the failures of our race.

Sometimes I have wondered that Christians denounce the suicide; that in old times they buried him where the roads crossed, and drove a stake through his body. They took his property from his children and gave it to the state.

If Christians would only think they would see that orthodox religion rests upon suicide—that man was redeemed by suicide, and that without suicide the whole world would have been lost.

If Christ was God, then he had the power to protect himself from the Jews without hurting them. But instead of using his power he allowed them to take his life.

If a strong man should allow a few little children to hack him to death with knives when he could easily have brushed them aside, would we not say that he committed suicide?

There is no escape. If Christ was in fact God, and allowed the Jews to kill him, then he consented to his own death—refused, though perfectly able, to defend and protect himself, and was in fact a suicide.

We cannot reform the world by law or by superstition. As long as there shall be pain and failure, want and sorrow, agony and crime, men and women will untie life's knot and seek the peace of death.

To the hopelessly imprisoned—to the dishonored and despised—to those who have failed, who have no future, no hope—to the abandoned, the broken-hearted, to those who are only remnants and fragments of men and women—how consoling, how enchanting is the thought of death!

And even to the most fortunate death at last is a welcome deliverer. Death is as natural and as merciful as life. When we have journeyed long—when we are weary—when we wish for the twilight, for the dusk, for the cool kisses of the night—when the senses are dull—when the pulse is faint and low—when the mists gather on the mirror of memory—when the past is almost forgotten, the present hardly perceived—when the future has but empty hands—death is as welcome as a strain of music.

After all, death is not so terrible as joyless life. Next to eternal happiness is to sleep in the soft clasp of the cool earth, disturbed by no dream, by no thought, by no pain, by no fear, unconscious of all and forever.

The wonder is that so many live, that in spite of rags and want, in spite of tenement and gutter, of filth and pain, they limp and stagger and crawl beneath their burdens to the natural end. The wonder is that so few of the miserable are brave enough to die—that so many are terrified by the "something after death"—by the specters and phantoms of superstition.

Most people are in love with life. How they cling to it in the arctic snows—now they struggle in the waves and currents of the sea—how they linger in famine—how they fight disaster and despair! On the crumbling edge of death they keep the flag flying and go down at last full of hope and courage.

But many have not such natures. They cannot bear defeat. They are disheartened by disaster. They lie down on the field of conflict and give the earth their blood.

They are our unfortunate brothers and sisters. We should not curse or blame—we should pity. On their pallid faces our tears should fall.

One of the best men I ever knew, with an affectionate wife, a charming and loving daughter, committed suicide. He was a man of generous impulses. His heart was loving and tender. He was conscientious, and so sensitive that he blamed himself for having done what at the time he thought was wise and best. He was the victim of his virtues. Let us be merciful in our judgments.

All we can say is that the good and bad, the loving and the malignant, the conscientious and the vicious, the educated and the ignorant, actuated by many motives, urged and pushed by circumstances and conditions—sometimes in the calm of judgment, sometimes in passion's storm and stress, sometimes in whirl and tempest of insanity—raise their hands against themselves and desperately put out the light of life.

Those who attempt suicide should not be punished. If they are insane they should, if possible, be restored to reason; if sane, they should be reasoned with, calmed, and assisted.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

News and Notes.

Neillsville, Wis., is in a kind of Arcadian country, where life is pleasant and the "golden mean" attainable, and there are no extremes. The "boom" has never visited this place; the speculator keepeth afar off. Things go on in a natural way. The country has developed in a healthful and comfortable fashion. There is nothing phenomenal in its growth. It has gone right along the even tenor of its way year in and year out, with seed time and harvest in regular succession, and whatever may happen the crops never fail, for there is such a varietv of production that if one thing happens to fall off, another will make abundant harvest. There are really no "hard times" at Neillsville. The people hav generally kept down to hard pan, and the revulsions of business are comparativly harmless. This year the hay, wheat, and oats are more than average, while the corn and potatoes, as elsewhere, do not just now put on a flourishing appearance. The drouth is greater than any for the last twenty years, and it still continues. The forest fires fill the air with smoke. A good rain would be worth millions of dollars to this vast territory. The priests are gathering in the shekels. Their dupes pav from two to five dollars apiece for every prayer.

Neillsville has about twenty-five hundred inhabitants. It is a county seat. There is quite a number of churches here; more really than the saints can well support. This is one of the most Liberal communities I hav been in—the majority are outside of the churches as a matter of conviction, and revivals do not succeed. One evangelist tried it last winter, but the converts were few and far between. There is a Unitarian society, which is radical and progressiv. Mr. Owens, who has preached or rather lectured here for some years, is an advanced thinker. The Rev. Mr. Whittemore, who at present supplies the pulpit, is about as far out as one can be and still believe somewhat in a "God of evolution" and the necessity of "religious feeling." He gave a cordial welcome to my work. I delivered five lectures in the Unitarian church, and the audiences increased every evening, and what was encouraging to note, about half were ladies, who seemed to take interest in these advanced questions. Some of the orthodox preachers were present and took notes, but I could not get any of them to meet me upon the platform. I did hav a little outside talk with the Methodist clergyman, but I found that he so thoroughly misunderstood my position that no progress could be made, for I could not pin him to a clear definition of words.

I feel sure that quite an agitation has been created in the community. The field has been well prepared for my efforts. Mrs. Freeman and Watts, Remsburg and Jamieson hav visited this place, and the fruit of their labors is apparent.

Besides giving five lectures at Neillsville I gave on Sunday afternoon a lecture at Greenwood—fifteen miles away—and here too I was greeted with a full house, although there was but a short time for advertising, as it was not decided to make this venture until after my arrival at Neillsville. This was the first Freethought lecture at Greenwood.

I had quite a pleasant journey to this place on Sunday. Mr. W. W. Taplin drove me over, and I had a good chance to see the country. It is pretty well wooded at present, although almost all the pine lumber has been cut off. In times past this has been a great timber region. Five hundred millions of feet hav been floated down the Black river yearly, mostly to LaCrosse and the Mississippi, and this still continues, but not from the vicinity of Neillsville. Still not half of the country has been cleared. The primitiv forests of maple, etc., still wave and log huts are occasionally seen. The barns are more extensiv than the dwellings, for the settlers think more of having a big barn than a fine house to liv in. The next ten years will undoubtedly make a vast change, for the times of struggle are ended and the days of leisure and luxury dawn. The wealth of this country is substantial. It does not depend on one product, but on many. Dairy farming is getting to be the chief industry.

Mr. Dan Cook, of Greenwood, is the leading worker in this place, and by his energetic efforts the lecture was in all respects a success. I had an opportunity to meet a number of Liberals. Mr. Cook's family is a regiment in itself. He counts a round dozen. He has nine children and they make a splendid battalion. Mr. Samuel Cawley, a veteran of this country, eighty-two years of age, is living with him. It was quite pleasant to visit such a multitudinous Freethought home. It givs one hopes of the coming generation.

I must thank Mrs. John Stewart for the beautiful flowers which decorated the desk, on which also was the Bible of the minister, for the hall in which I spoke is also used for religious services. I do not know how the Christians will feel now that the Infidel has occupied the place of the clergyman. It may be they will hav to fumigate the place in order that their faith may not be contaminated. Among those whom I met at Greenwood, and who aided in the work, are Mr. and Mrs. Henry Tooly, A. W. Bailey, Ervin Hoard, P. Rossman, A. M. White, Dr. T. L. Buland, C. Wollenberg, on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and others. I cannot mention the names of all, but Greenwood certainly has hoisted the flag of freedom with cheering results.

On the way up we stopped at the home of Mr. Taplin's brother and took dinner. Mr. Taplin is lately from Canada, and has charge of a farm of four hundred acres. He has just harvested over one hundred tons of hay. The barns are well packed. Mr. Taplin is a hard worker and doesn't depend on providence for anything that he gets. After the lecture I took supper with Mr. Cook, and spent about half an hour trying to get acquainted with his numerous family. We returned to Neillsville in time for the evening lecture at that place. I had a busy Sunday, and was on the go from morning until night.

Mr. S. C. Boardman, who arranged for the lectures at Neillsville, is a veteran of Freethought, and one of the earliest settlers of this country. He came to Neillsville in 1856, when there was but one house here, and has remained ever since through varied fortunes, and been true to his colors. He has seen the whole country change from a wilderness to its present prosperity.

Mr. R. Dewhurst, one of the leading and wealthiest citizens of the place, came here in 1858, and through an adventurous and activ career has won his fortune. He has taken the Investigator for thirty-six years, and is now also on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is always ready to lend a hand. I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Taplin, who are earnest Freethinkers, and their children also. His daughter is one of the teachers in the public schools, as is also Mr. Cook's eldest daughter; but they stand for purely secular principles, and this does not seem to injure their standing or success. The schools of Wisconsin are conducted on a pretty liberal plan. The religious services are disappearing.

Among other stanch supporters of Liberalism at Neillsville are James Campbell, Carl Stany, William Burt, Philip Berg, who has always been an activ worker; J. B. Jones, a fellow soldier of the Army of the Republic; C. A. Youmans, a cousin of the celebrated E. L. Youmans, and a Freethinker both by blood and brain; C. C. Sniteman, J. H. Radan, William Hazlett, W. W. Woodward, G. A. Ludington, R. W. Canfield, and others. I could add fifty names if need be. Freethought is a power in this community, although it is somewhat latent, and not always ready to stand at the front for action; but it is certainly impervious to the attacks of the church. An attempt was made to stop base-ball playing on Sunday, but it was an ignominious failure. The people by a large majority would not submit to it; and the movers in the prosecution, with tears and apologies, retreated to "innocuous desuetude."

I shall probably visit Neillsville and Greenwood again this winter, and carry on the campaign which so far has been so generously supported. It fills one with hope to greet so many friends, and to feel that the atmosphere about you is impregnated with Freethought, and that the shadow of orthodoxy is on the wane. In some places orthodoxy is like a black cloud, and weighs on one like an incubus; but here it seems to be penetrated and flooded with the rays of the coming day. In material prosperity as well as in intellectual culture, Neillsville is one of the happy portions of this planet.

Whitehall is about forty-four miles from Neillsville, a county seat, like Neillsville, of five hundred inhabitants. It is situated in the same kind of country as Neillsville; heavily wooded, with fertil clearings and rolling hills, which giv a delightful variety to the landscape. The smoke hangs about so thicklv that I hav no chance to take a general view. Night watchmen are now appointed to look out for the fires.

There is a good Liberal element at Whitehall and the surrounding towns. Blair, Independence, etc., send a fair delegation to the lectures. I giv three, and the hall is full every night. The ministers come and take notes; but I cannot get them to take the platform. I suppose they will answer after I get away.

The lectures hav made a good opening, I think, for future work, although it is the same here as elsewhere. Many of the Liberals are indifferent.

Still there are some earnest workers. Charles A. Ecker arranged with me for the lectures. His name has already appeared among the correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and he is devoted to the cause, knowing by experience what the dark shadows of orthodoxv are. His brother, Irvin H. Ecker, studied in early life for the ministry, but the preparatory reading of the Bible made him an Infidel, and he has ever since been true to his convictions, and chosen the hard way of the pioneer instead of the flowery path of conformitv. He is well posted in the facts and principles of Freethought, is a student and writer, and I found great pleasure in my acquaintance with him, which I am sure will make a life-long friendship. Capt. C. E. Scott, a soldier comrade, introduced me the first evening, and Mr. J. D. Olds the second and third evenings, and these are stanch representativs of our cause. Mr. B. F. Wing is another old-time Liberal whom I was glad to meet, who is one of our generous supporters here; also F. W. Farrington, of Arcadia, a cultivated Freethinker. Dr. Bodom of Blair, J. D. Pratt, M. F. Whitney, E. S. Hotchkiss, S. E. Cook, and F. E. Shappie of Independence attended the lectures and aided the funds. I cannot mention all the friends of Whitehall, there are so many. Among them, however, are L. H. Whitney, L. L. Solsrud, senior and junior, A. W. Bensend, W. S. Kidder, James Larson, etc. My work at Whitehall has been most encouraging. It shows that the world is progressing. A beginning has been made auspicious of the days to come.

I make a long jump from here to Fargo, N. D. This is one of the difficulties of our Freethought work—that we hav to span such immense spaces to reach our different fields of labor. But this must be done until we are better organized and can arrange for lectures with less labor and travel. Undoubtedly there are many places between here and Fargo where I could lecture, but the Liberals hav not moved in the matter and I must pass them by. I hope, however, that during the coming fall and winter Liberals will make an effort for work in their vicinity.

I shall return to Chicago in September and devote myself to the joint congress to be held in October. I feel that we can hav a great gathering if we only try. These "national encampments" are just as necessary to our movement as to other great organizations. It givs a new impetus and ampler power for meeting the important issues presented throughout the country, and concerning which there must be a union of our forces. Come to the October congress. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Observations.

Last Monday morning's papers announced, with a unanimity quite remarkable as a coincidence, that the Wilson tariff bill as revised by the Senate was doomed, for the House would never agree to it. At the same time enormous transactions in sugar were reported. Monday evening's papers brought the news that the House had surrendered, and purchasers of sugar made twenty-five per cent or so on their investments in twenty-four hours. The bill as passed will be worth, it is claimed, forty million dollars annually to the sugar trust, while the iron kings and coal barons are similarly favored. I expect that the congressmen who voted for these measures hav been amply remunerated. I hope so. The gravity of an offense is often mitigated by the circumstance that the temptation was great. Let us giv the accused the benefit of the doubt.

When the House of Representativs had the army and navy appropriation bill under consideration, the appropriators incorporated in it an item of $25,000 for the purchase of a gun of English manufacture to please the boys at Annapolis. A member objected that $25,000 was a big price for a gun, whereupon the mover of the resolution explained that the actual cost was but $14,000. The objecting member then inquired what the extra appropriation of $11,000 was for, and the mover said it was to pay the duty on the imported weapon. "Oh," said the other; "it is all right then, and I will vote for the item. But I thought that the foreigner paid the duty." Then there was an audible hush in that part of the house occupied by Brother McKinley's cuckoos.

Monsignor Satolli, the American pope, has put the stamp of his disapproval on the liquor business, and the Catholic dealers are threatened with dire penalties unless they quit it. They will not be admitted to Catholic societies, absolution will be withheld, and they cannot be buried in consecrated ground. The liquor men generally regard the order as a bluff, and there is no record that any of them has seriously thought of obeying it. They can get along without the church better than the church can get along without them. Their places of business are systematically worked by the begging sisterhood, who reap a good harvest from their customers, and the church poor box stands alongside the nickel-in-the-slot machine. The priests, may be, hav been taking lessons of the policemen; and as those guardians of the peace use the law to extort blackmail from liquor sellers and dive keepers, so the guardians of souls will use Satolli's decree as a handle wherewith to pump larger contributions from the same classes.

Mr. Charles Watts, THE TRUTH SEEKER's London correspondent, takes occasion to call down an English bishop who avers that the prohibition of open picture-galleries on Sunday, also of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, was established in Eden. I judge that the bishop has been misunderstood. It was doubtless living pictures to which he referred, as, according to the account, Adam and Eve were the first to giv an exhibition of that character. The prohibition is implied rather than stated, but the discoverers of Bible temperance should hav no trouble in finding it. It is easy, too, to see that the Bible condemns marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Everybody is familiar with the command making marriage with a deceased brother's wife compulsory, whether the survivor be already married or not, but nobody obeys it, which implies that believers do not think the author of the Bible meant what he said. If, then, he did not mean what he said, we are bound to conclude that he did mean what he didn't say. Hence, brethren, marriage with a deceased wife's sister is unscriptural. The prohibition was intended as a penalty which the citizen incurs by not marrying the sister in the first place.

Some years ago readers of the New York Sun noted with disgust, though without surprise, that that journal had suddenly become the organ of the Catholic church. Whether for the same reason it also became the champion of Tammany Hall, or whether, being the champion of Tammany, it must of necessity turn Catholic, the public doesn't know. The bargain was not advertised. To the non-Catholic reader, the Sun has apparently kept its contract, but there are indications that the church is not satisfied. The Sun does not denounce the American Protectiv Association as the editor of the Catholic Review thinks it should, and the editor of the Review is now engaged in prodding Mr. Dana. "The Sun," he says, with significant "ahs" and "wells," "has always been largely read by Catholics"—a hint that it will be no longer so patronized unless an improvement on the A. P. A. question is noted. "The course of the Sun," continues the Review, "has been decidedly erratic of late." No allusion is made to a dozen other papers, the policy of which has been the same as that of the one criticised. The editor of the Review has a weakness for letting out things that the public has no business to know, but he always shuts himself up with a cork when further elaboration of the subject is called for. He probably couldn't be induced to tell where he got his authority for scolding the Sun in a column editorial ostensibly written to flatter the Times. Not at his instance shall the nigger in the wood pile further emerge. I hope to see the merry jaw go on to an open rupture. As one who has for many years read the Sun in pursuance of a habit formed when it was worth reading, I should be pleased to note the departure from its columns of that Jesuitry, now so conspicuous, which has tainted its news with falsehood, reduced its editorial opinions to echoes from the Vatican, destroyed its influence for good, and left it a political outcast—a disrespected follower of Corrigan and Tammany Hall.

The bomb-throwing Anarchists hav achieved a new distinction, the United States Senate having passed a bill providing especially for their exclusion from this country. The machinery proposed for this purpose is elaborate, being nothing less than the stationing of United States inspectors at foreign ports to watch passenger lists and to examin all intended immigrants as to their political views. It will create soft berths for a big body of deputies and help dispose of any treasury surplus that may occur. The bomb throwers themselvs should feel flattered by being thus segregated from other criminals. It increases their political stature to be specially legislated against. They will also hav a grievance, and they will inquire why a government should discriminate against such insignificant foreign cutthroats as themselvs, and at the same time enter into treaty relations with the czar of Russia. Their record is quite brief and their operations very limited, while the czar has maintained for years a slaughter-house to which the average American, exercising the liberty he has been accustomed to at home, would be summarily consigned. As I look at it, the United States government is unnecessarily perturbed. Its jails are capacious, hemp is cheap, and the activity of the police in apprehending suspected persons is as great as could be desired. We also hav a force of dog-catchers, skilled in throwing the rope, together with cages so arranged that they may be lowered from a derrick into the river. Then we hav a public sentiment which would not allow a jury to leave their seats in order either to convict a dynamiter or to acquit a citizen who should hav the good luck to break the neck of a bomb-thrower. Primitiv justice, I think, would be more effectiv in these cases than federal laws, as witness the disrepute into which horsestealing in the West has fallen. Citizens could consistently exterminate train-wreckers, incendiaries, and practical "Anarchists," but a government which conspires with Russia to take life by means more atrocious than those adopted by either of the three classes of criminals named might be charged with inconsistency in legislating against them.

While a rattled community is demanding more stringent laws against promiscuous homicides, the work of training the youth of the country in the art of killing one another systematically goes steadily on under the encouragement of church and state. "During the past few years," observes a New York daily, "both Catholics and Protestants hav organized the boys under instruction in their Sunday and parochial schools for military drill, and the number of youth now included in these companies and brigades aggregates many thousands in this city alone!" The propriety of so uniting the church and the army is defended on the ground that patriotism is thus "linked with religious faith and devotion"—in other words, such homicidal tendency as the handling of deadly weapons may develop is to be stimulated by religious fanaticism. The further plea is made by the politicians that by this means the country will hav ready at hand a force to put down, in an emergency, the "enemies of society;" and so the drilling goes on in the face of the fact that the society that supports the largest army has the most enemies, while the least military country has fewest disturbers of order.

Everybody has stopped looking to the church for anything that could be mistaken for consistency, or it might be asked how Christians who regard Christ, with his "Peace on earth," otherwise than as a visionary crank can organize their youth for war. The secret is that by meanc of the military drill the churches are enabled to attract to their Sunday-schools thousands of boys who would not attend for the sake of religious "instruction." These churches make fighters of the boys in order to get their pennies to use in spreading the gospel of peace. If anybody can find in such an arrangement any place for the introduction of patriotism, I would like to hav them indicate the precise spot where it comes in.

But the politicians, if not the churches, it may be said, are inspired by patriotism. Not to any alarming extent. The recent debate in Congress on the army appropriation bill left no shadow of doubt where the interest of the patriots is centered. For each college and school a military instructor is to be detailed. Such a detail is regarded as a "plum," and plums are the coin in which Congressmen pay their political debts. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Mrs. Lois Waisbroker, editor and publisher of Foundation Principles, Topeka, Kansas, was arrested on August 2d at the instigation of R. M. McAfee, postal inspector and agent of Comstock's society for the alleged suppression of vice. Taken before United States Commissioner Mileham, Mrs. Waisbroker waived examination and was released in bonds of $300. We are not advised what the offending publication was in this instance.

Comrades, After All.

Truth Tersely Stated.

ST. NICHOLAS, PA., July 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I would say that I am sorry I could not remit it sooner, as I know such journals as THE TRUTH SEEKER never hav the financial aid and support they ought to hav, and such as less worthy papers enjoy. With best regards, War Is Declared, Sure Enough.

VINELAND, N. J., Aug. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to see you hav laid siege to the Bible. That book must be put aside before the human race can ever be what it should be. It has falsehoods, and is vulgar and obscene, and to call it God's word is blasphemous. All those that read with sound brains in their head pronounce it the filthiest book ever read. Read Gen. xxxviii, and scores of like crumbs. Then tell us what worse ever came from the slums. Amen! Selah!

Hear, Hear!

LAMINE, MO., July 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, to be placed to my credit on subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, the best paper I know of. Some of your subscribers seem to be displeased with the political discussion going on through THE TRUTH SEEKER. For my part I think there is as much need of a reform in politics as anything else, and I insist that a reform in that direction can be brought about only through the Freethought element. If they fail, down goes American liberty. A. J. BRIGGS.

We Guessed It.

PAWTUCKET, R. I., Aug. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I find in your issue of July 21st the query, "What does the Catholic Review mean?" I reply that it has simply let the cat out of the bag. Your idea is quite correct. Where she is weak she cries out for "freedom of conscience;" but where she is strong, the Roman Catholic church will crush the life out of any and all other churches. The history of the world is here to prove it, and that is why the Roman Catholic church, its monks and nuns, hav been driven out by thirty-nine different European powers after causing revolutions and destruction, and leaving death and desolation behind them.

I am sorry to see this great, good, bright, and too generous people duped by that same sect. The day is coming when you will see how much the allegiance given to the United States amounts to in comparison with that owned to the Pope by a Roman Catholic. Respectfully, 1094.

Doing His Share.

GRAFTON, W. VA., July 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your esteemed paper for several years and a subscriber for one year, and must say that in general it meets my views better than any other paper or periodical I ever read—and I hav read many in my time. I throw none of the copies of it away, but send them out to do missionary work. I hav the satisfaction of securing one convert, and several others are almost persuaded. Missionary work is badly needed in this place. There are ten churches among a population of scarcely four thousand. What a heavy tax it must be to maintain such a lot of drones, and what a protest would be heard if a similar amount was raised by authority of the state or federal government!

Inclosed please find $1, which apply on my subscription. Next week I will send you the cash for my friend's subscription and my own for one year and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

Your friend and well-wisher,

PETER LAMBRECHT.

The Unjust Went Dry This Time.

GIBBON, NEB., Aug. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: A trial of Christian faith and God's verity was lately made near here with the following result. Our country—this state—is dried up and crops are ruined. Christians hav been praying for rain, but no rain comes. In School District No. 22 the residents use the school house for church purposes. On last Sunday a certain preacher stated that the reason for the drouth was that so many Infidels and ungodly men lived here, and he made particular and wrathful allusion to one John M. Bayley, an outspoken Infidel, but well-to-do farmer, who livs in that neighborhood Then this man of God got down on his knees and prayed vehemently and vociferously for rain. On the Monday night following his prayer was answered. But lo, the inscrutable ways of Providence! The rainfall was very limited, and the central part of it fell copiously on the land of John M. Bayley, and gave the reverend god-man but a dry sprinkle. I should hav stated that the preacher owns a farm in this neighborhood and was therefore personally interested in the rain. Was this a sign from the Lord, like the dew on the fleece of wool, that he is no respecter of persons, and that he sends the rain upon the just and the unjust? C. PUTNAM.

An Exotic Mayor.

RED JACKET, MICH., July 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: On the 16th of this month I rented the public opera hall for S. P. Putnam to deliver Freethought lectures in. The next day the mayor came to me and said, "You cannot hav the hall for such purpose. My goodness," he said, "that man is an Infidel."

The mayor should hav heard the first lecture, "The Rights of Man." He might thus hav learned the meaning of true republicanism, of true democracy, provided that intelligence could hav been imparted short of a surgical operation. He is a transplant from Canada, and has not become entirely assimilated to this republican form of government. He should learn that the public opera house belongs to the people, equally as much as the public roads or post-office. With the prerogativs he has assumed, he should not hav allowed Mr. Putnam to step from the cars upon the public highways, and in order to liv up to his convictions the mayor should not hav permitted Mr. Putnam to meander to the hotel. He prevented Mr. Putnam from speaking in the public opera hall, and with equal success prevented $45 from going into the public treasury—all on the assumption that Christianity is the father of all morality and virtue and progress, and of this most splendid government of equality, liberty, and justice; but if the assumption is true, why are some Christians so narrow and illiberal? Selfishness is not a virtue. To deprive another of liberty is immoral, and to assume authority the people hav not delegated is unjust.

Mr. Putnam gave three splendid lectures and left many warm friends in this neck of the woods. The way will be much easier for the next Freethought lecturer.

C. H. CHASE.

Hardly Practicable.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Aug. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The August 4th number has just come to hand. As a member of the Letter-Writing Corps I hav mailed my missiv to Attorney-General Olney on the J. B. Wise matter. I wonder how many are in the corps.

Noting the remarks of E. B. Foote, Jr., secretary of the National Defense Association, I venture to make some suggestions. Of course Liberals should come to the rescue of the persecuted one, and I promis $5 if not more; but is this not an opportune time to carry the war into Africa by adopting Col. W. H. Burr's suggestion, to indict the American Bible Society? It would be a blessing to the world if the circulation of that filthy monstrosity, the Bible, could be stopped. For this offensiv move I would be one of fifty or twenty to contribute $50 each. I never heard of the National Defense Association before, as I but recently had the pleasure of getting into the Freethinkers' ranks, so that I don't know what has been done in this way before. We should make the most of the opportunity. I hav long wondered if, on a test, the Bible could not be excluded from the mails. I will try to bring the case before the public here, through the local press; but the papers sometimes reject my contributions when there is much Freethought in them. Awaiting further advice in next week's paper, I am Yours truly, S. S. BRYAN.

P.S.—The Times-Democrat, the leading paper here, is getting more liberal. It recently editorially condemned the "religious persecution" by which a Tennesseean was imprisoned for working on Sunday; it even started a subscription for his relief. S. S. B.

[Referring to the proposition to indict the American Bible Society (which, by the way, was not Colonel Burr's), we would say that whatever benefit might inure to the cause of Freethought through the calling of public attention in the manner indicated by our correspondent to the dangers menacing freedom of press and mails would be likely to be more than counterbalanced by the odium which would attach to any attempt to stop by law the circulation of the Bible. However desirable it might be to wean the world from its stupid reverence for that book, it would scarcely be advisable to attack it in the way indicated. Liberals know that the legal prosecution of a book is the surest way to increase its circulation, and no argument is needed to convince a Rationalist that false ideas are eliminated only when true ideas are born in the brain? Freethinkers do not desire to wield the sword of proscription which the church has made the scourge of the race. Had the church never resorted to force to compel acceptance of her creeds or to stop the dissemination of books repugnant to her we should not regard her to-day as the worst enemy of liberty and justice. We are scarcely anxious to wear her mantle or to become the incarnation of her spirit. If the educated minds of the world no longer accept the Bible as the word of God, force has not emancipated them, but Science and Reason. Better explain the Bible rather than legislate against it. If the Christians like the book as it is, and want to swallow it whole, we will not send the sheriff to take it away from them. They are at liberty to dine with Ezekiel and to sit upon the wall with the men to whom Rabshakeh was sent.—ED. T. S.]

The Work of Secularization.

HAMILTON, N. Y., July 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: During many years I hav noticed the efforts of many religious leaders of this country to get laws enacted that would sustain the orthodox religion. The church power is thoroughly organized and is brought into action to bring about that result, and they hav hope of success, and at times it seems they hav reason for that hope. The Secularists of the country hav for a long time insisted upon nine demands, but hav not as yet obtained one of them. I long since thought the Secularists ought to unite and obtain one demand at a time, and after getting one try for another, for after getting one it will be easier to get the next; and I would suggest that the first effort be to get the legislature of our state to pass a law taxing all church property and also taxing all ministers the same as all other people, exempting no one on account of his religious views or professions.

To accomplish this desirable end, the first thing to do is to begin at our primary political meetings. When we hav our caucus meetings to send a delegate to county conventions to nominate assemblymen, hav nominated none but those who will be pledged to use all lawful, honorable means for the passage of a law taxing all church property in this state; and the one so nominated and so pledged will be sure to be elected. It will make little difference to which political party the nominee belongs. All parties will be anxious for his election, for nearly all the tax-payers wish such a law was in existence. Liberals must unite in this way if they ever expect to get what they demand.

It is one of the worst features in our state laws to exempt from taxation so many millions. Many are now offering themselvs as candidates for nomination as assemblymen. Let such aspirants declare in advance that if they are nominated and elected they will vote for a law taxing church property of every description, and ministers the same as others. That candidate will surely be elected. There is no doubt of it; seven-tenths of the voters and tax-payers in the state heartily wish such a law was now in existence, and will vote for the one pledged for the creation of such a law. Even churchmen, nearly all of them, own that such exemption is wrong. It is a wonder that the large majority of tax-payers hav so long submitted to the burden they hav carried on their shoulders when it could hav been so easily thrown off.

The time is near when our assembly will be selected for the coming term, so let the tax-payers look about and select the right sort of man and put him in nomination. Hav a man nominated on this issue. Such nominee will be sure to be elected.

If voters will unite and orgauize and act with determination, a law would be passed during the next legislature taxing many millions of now untaxed property. Property that has no right to be exempted has escaped taxation too long.

When such is the law of this state it soon will be the law of other states; for, strange as it may appear, such injustice in taxation exists in nearly all the other states. When equity prevails in taxation, people will not be so afraid to see the tax collector after taxes as they long hav been. I hope others will take up this matter and agitate this subject until justice and relief are obtained. Then after the sittings of the board of supervisors are had, and their taxes are found to be so much less than usual, many will inquire the reason, and when they realize the cause they will be astonished that they and their ancestors were so long fooled into carrying such a burden so many centuries for the benefit of so few when it could so easily be thrown off.

CARLTON RICE.

Mortuary—Mrs. Annie K. Miller.

PORTLAND, OR., July 24, 1894.

DIED, June 19, E.M. 294, Annie K. Miller, wife of Mr. P. H. Miller, of Canby, Or., aged forty-two years, two months, and fourteen days. A husband, eight children, and many friends mourn her death.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Miller, though at one time a stanch Catholic, was at the time of her death a Secularist, and with her husband enjoyed the gospel as preached by THE TRUTH SEEKER. In the presence of a large concourse of friends, I delivered the following address:

Though I am sure that words are inadequate to dispel your grief at the loss of a loving wife and mother and friend, yet it is well before giving back to earth her lifeless form, now before us, to meditate for a few moments upon the splendid examples of her noble life, her energy, her devotion, and her steadfastness to truth and to right. It is well to ask, "Is there not, through all the clouds of gloom which now seem to hang so closely over your lives, an occasional break revealing sunshine and happiness?"

Nearly two score years is a long time in which to scatter seeds of kindness. It is a long time in which to inspire others with courage. It is a long time in which to labor in love for those near and dear. It is a long time in which to be industrious, true and helpful to others. And all these can truly be said of her who is now cold in death. She has lived to help make the world better than she found it. She has lived to stand at the side of a devoted husband, and together they built a happy home for their sons and daughters. Yes, yes, sadly will she be missed, but the good sense, the earnestness, the tender affection for the living which were characteristic of this mother hav all left their impress upon this family. They will be sensible in all their troubles. Their mother's love will be their guide and shield in every act. It will make them brave and true as she was.

We love the memory of this exemplary mother because she understood what love meant; because she shed tears of pity for the oppressed; because her mind was free from barbarous creeds; because her religion was "to do good." We love her because, side by side with her husband, she stood upon the platform of truth and reason and worked for the gospel of this world. That is why I say she has left this world better than she found it. Every kind act, every gentle word, every tender smile, makes some one better and happier, and our precious dead has freely bestowed all these on those whom she knew.

I did not hav the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with this tender mother, but a mutual friend who informed me of her death said, "Another splendid woman gone." It is true that she is gone, to be resolved back into the elements from whence she came; but her kindness, her firmness, her gentleness, her devotion are not gone; they still exist, still survive, in the love and fond memories of husband, children, and friends.

Whether she exists as an individual entity; whether, beyond the dark river of death, her ship of life still sails; whether she is cognizant of these last sad rites, we do not know; but within the heart and mind of each one of us is spanned the arch of a hope for conscious immortality.

Dear friends, it will perhaps lessen your sorrow when you think that you are not alone in your grief. Not a day, not an hour, but death gently closes the eyes and blows out the breath of some loved one. Tiny babes, as beautiful as the dew-kissed rose; youth in all its innocence and purity; strong manhood and strong young womanhood, just awakening to the realities of life; fathers whose deaths mean anguish and suffering to those who depended on them; mothers whose children will not hav even a father's care; grandfathers and grandmothers bowed with the weight of years—all of these each day are silently crossing the great river of death and are leaving loved ones to weep and mourn as you now mourn.

The same messenger who has entered your home and beckoned the suffering mother to follow, each year enters thousands of homes. It has made you sad, as it has saddened the lives of others. And while you and we are bereaved, while our hearts are breaking, while tears fill our eyes, yet we know we cannot reach the departed one.

With her all is well. We hav no fear that death bodes evil. We know that life and death are essential conditions. We see life and death, organization and decomposition, on every side. One is but the natural result of the other. Let us, then, endeavor to look upon death as a simple condition—nothing to be dreaded, nothing to be feared. Where intelligence is, there the future is not filled with fear and cruel demons do not hover around the coffin of loved ones.

Though the sunshine of your home has been shadowed, yet it must not obscure the star of hope. Gather strength and courage from the thought that the loving wife and mother is free from all pain, and that since she is transplanted beyond your care, your help, you will giv your time and strength not only to the treasures that are left you, but also to better the conditions of other people—not only those who are born, but those who are yet to come.

I know this is a sad blow for you all. Time alone will lessen your suffering, but I am sure that memory of this dear one will make us all gentler, kinder, and more willing to help one another.

Oh, there is still so much for us to liv for, so much for us to do. So let us honor the memory of this wife and mother, not by lamenations and tears, but by acts tender and true, by generous deeds, by noble impulses.

With gentle hands we will giv back to mother earth this atom from the eternal universe, while we who are left behind go on with life's work, plucking the thorns of misfortune and want and despair from humanity's path and cultivating the perfumed flowers of hope and love.

A mass of beautiful flowers in wreaths and bouquets were sent by those who knew and loved our friend. At the grave the exercises closed with the following words:

The record of a generous life, vinelike,
Runs round the memory of our dead,
And every sweet, unselfish act
Is now a perfumed flower.

. . . . . .

Upon the peaceful shore of death
The sea of trouble casts no wave.
Eves curtained with the everlasting dark
Will never know again the burning touch of tears.
Lips sealed with eternal silence
Will never speak again the broken words of grief.
Within the tomb no veiled and weeping sorrow sits.
And in its gloom is crouched no shuddering fear.
And so we leave our dead
Where nature leaves them;
We love, we wait, we hope.

RAPID RIVER, MICH., July 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In considering this subject it is well to remember that the Persians were a very bigoted race, looking upon themselvs as God's peculiar people, and believing that all the nations of the earth would become one in religion and rule, and that religion and rule would be Persian, and they had been trained in this belief, from generation to generation, for hundreds, perhaps thousands of years. Now, when their long-cherished dream must hav seemed to them on the eve of realization, the utter absurdity of supposing they would assist a captiv race to rear a temple to another god begins to dawn on us. There is no doubt that the rulers and priests who superintended the Jerusalem mission were Persians, and the history of Persia would be their history, and the little tributary tribe who had lived there before would be no more to them than Chippewa Indians to United States citizens. Those who became converts to their religion would be admitted to the colony, and as religion of some kind is a necessity to an ignorant, superstitious people, and the gods and religions of these Syrian tribes would be destroyed in the general ruin, this would be a very successful mission. And if the power of Persia had remained unbroken it would eventually hav incorporated all the scattered remnants of these old Syrian and Phenician tribes under one general government and religion, a new Persia. But when the Grecians defeated the Persians, and the Grecian army was marching toward Palestine, the rulers of this colony, knowing the cruelty of Asiatic conquerors, would expect no mercy at the hands of the Grecians if they acknowledged themselvs Persians, and so to save their lives they passed themselvs off as a remnant of this old Judean people, and knowing that the Grecians were well informed in the history of all these tribes, all the incidents in the history of this Judean tribe that they knew themselvs they interpolated into their own history, making the history of this little tributary tribe inconsistent and absurd, until we are forced to the conclusion that it is the history of the two peoples. In our opinion, after carefully reading this Jewish history, all the early history is Persian. The description Moses gave of the land; the description of the spies on their return of the wealth, civilization, and strength of the several different independent tribes or nations who inhabited it; the description of their numbers and power, in Joshua, during the butchery—all these descriptions might be applicable to Persia before it was conquered by its present inhabitants, but could never hav been applicable to the little rocky strip of country called Palestine, as it is only one hundred and forty miles long and scarcely forty broad, cut up by ravines and rocky hills, a great deal of it good for nothing. The horde Moses is said to hav led to its borders would hav eaten everything eatable in the land in marching through it, and to hav remained in it would hav meant starvation, while Persia is a large fertil country and capable of maintaining an immense population. All this early history of the Persians would require little alteration, excepting changing the names of places and persons, and the first attempt made to graft an incident in the history of the little Judean tribe on to the Persian is like trying to fit an inch pipe on to the thick end of London's main sewer. This is the tribute-collecting tour made by Shishak, king of Egypt (1 Kings xiv, 22), in the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign. That Shishak could enter Jerusalem without fighting a battle and take everything of value out of it, when its king, Rehoboam, could hav raised an army large enough, if well generaled, to hav overrun half the world, forces us either to admit the double history, or discard the whole story as poorly written fiction, as it is more inconsistent and absurd than anything ever penned by a dime novelist.

From here to near the close of the Jewish history, it is an incomprehensible puzzle. Of course we are well aware that faith can remove mountains of lies by swallowing them whole, peaks and all, and we are likewise aware that, without lies, faith would die of starvation, as they are its natural food. But a reader without this glutton faith, with the capacious swallow, finds these mountainous lies insurmountable. What sane man can believe that this little strip of rocky country could raise two armies, one of 400,000 men, and the other 800,000 men, and that out of one army 500,000 men were slain in one day? (2 Chron. xiii.) What sane man believes that Jehoshaphat, on a small slice of this territory, kept a standing army nearly a million strong (2 Chron. xvii)? and this immense army had to be supported on the internal resources of the country, as it had no seaboard, and the ships Jehoshaphat built must hav sailed the sea of Galilee, as he did not hav access to any other, and it, in comparison with some of our inland lakes, is only a frog puddle. As we near the time of Nebuchadnezzar the history becomes more Judean and less Persian, but still the reader is far from being prepared for the final denouement, where all the ablebodied men fit for his army, found by Nebuchadnezzar throughout all the land, was seven thousand. And the reader can only ejaculate, Great Jerusalem, what a downcome!

If we admit the double history, this is what we might expect, as of the early history of this insignificant tribe little would be known, but as it approached its end the materials for manufacturing its history would become more plentiful, and all they knew of it they would learn from the archives of Egypt and Chaldea. And we believe this explains it all, and is all there is to it. It will no doubt be a terrible shock to the superstitious to learn that they hav deserted their god and are adoring their devil; but we are determined to hew to the line, let the chips fall where they will.

By reading the last two chapters of Second Kings, all honest readers will be satisfied that this Jerusalem tribe cannot be the people whose history is recorded in these books, as some of our one-year old Western towns in the number of inhabitants could hav discounted all the land. All honest readers will likewise be satisfied that no women were carried captiv to Babylon, excepting the mother and wives of Jehoachin, and they must hav been as prolific as Australian rabbits if their families numbered over forty thousand at the return from their captivity; and as Jehoachin was kept in prison thirty-seven years, who was the father of these families? And we positivly assert that no women were carried captiv, except those mentioned, or it would hav been recorded, as the smallest article taken by either Nebuchadnezzar or his captain Nebuzaradan, is mentioned, even to the brass snuffers and firepan. Besides, it is a well-authenticated historical fact that when any of these Asiatic scourges sacked city or land, as Nebuchadnezzar did these, the women became the prey of the invader's army, and their miseries were soon ended. And any assertion that women (except those mentioned) were carried captiv to Babylon is a lie, told either ignorantly or knowingly, as there is nothing in the story to lead any one to suppose such a thing. A remnant of the feeble and diseased left by Nebuchadnezzar fled to Egypt, but whether they reached there or died by the way, they hav never been heard from.

The books Ezra and Nehemiah are fiction, and no doubt were written by the Persians residing in Jerusalem as props to the shaky history they had manufactured to save their lives; and the Grecians must hav been approaching rapidly, as they hav evidently been written in a hurry. In the summing up of the sham census there is an error of several thousand, which with time to check would not hav occurred. This alone would condemn the books, but several statements they make throw discredit on them; we will call attention to only one, Neh. xiii. 23, 24, "In those days also saw I Jews that had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab: and their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of each people." If this is not nonsense, what is? Half-breeds do not make a half language, they talk the father's language whole, or the mother's language whole, sometimes both, and if these had spoken according to the language of each people, as one of the parents was a Jew, they would certainly hav spoken in the Jewish language. This makes it clear that several languages were spoken in this colony or mission, and had to be accounted for in some manner, and that it was gathered from all the surrounding tribes. It is only wasting time discussing these books, as the two last chapters of Kings prove them a fiction. And the Jewish return from captivity, with all that rests thereon, must take its place with the fairy tales and other illusions of our childhood.

Before closing we will call the attention of the reader to the great changes which hav taken place in the religious beliefs of the people in the reign of King Hezekiah. If the faiths of their forefathers had remained unshaken, to hav laid violent hands on their serpent god, the god bequeathed them by their founder, which had been held sacred for hundreds of years, would hav been looked upon by them as a sin of the most sacrilegious kind, and we may be certain some great religious reformer must hav arisen at this time and stamped his doctrins on the hearts and lives of the people. Without this, it would be as unintelligible to us as the image-smashing period of John Knox in Scotland with the Reformation left out. And we believe Persia givs us the key to this, as sometime during their career when settled in Persia, Zoroaster, a great religious reformer, changed the currents of their religious superstitions.

And as the Greeks were a very inquisitiv people, some of them would know the doctrins of Zoroaster as well as the priests, hence this silence about all which caused this religious revolution in the reign of Hezekiah, and they adopted the older ritual of worship, well knowing that the teachings of Zoroaster would hav betrayed their secret to the Greeks. And there is little doubt that the rough edges had been ground off this older ritual by Zoroaster and his priests to reconcile it with their own teachings, as we see the advanced priests of the present day are still applying the emory. That their god was known by several pet names we cannot doubt, as we see the Christ among our own superstitious people is the same, and that Jehovah was one of these seems certain, as it has an Aryan derivation; in this all philologists agree. All the fundamental beliefs of the Jews and Persians were identical, as readers can discover for themselvs by reading Bennett's "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," vol. ii., pp. 240-244. These books ought to be in every house in the land, as the information they contain is invaluable, and must hav taken long years and great patience and ability to collect.

We will close this article by stating that as the Israelitish captivity in Egypt has been so thoroughly exposed as fiction by so many able writers, we hav refrained from mentioning it. And we hav no doubt if the exodus of the Persians from Aryanista is discovered, it will lay bare the source of the Jewish. TOM WALKER

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Poor Little Toe.

'I am all tired out," said the mouth with a pout,
"I am all tired out with talk."
"Just wait," said the knee, "till you're as lame as can be,
And then hav to walk—walk—walk."
"My work," said the hand, "is the hardest in the land."
"Nay, mine is harder yet," said the brain.
"When you toil," said the eye, "as steadily as I,
"Why, then you'll hav reason to complain."

Then a voice faint and low of the poor little toe
Spoke out in the dark with a wail:
"It is seldom I complain, but you all will bear your pain
With more patience if you hearken to my tale.
I'm the youngest of five, and the others live and thrive,
They are cared for and considered and admired.
I am overlooked and snubbed, I am pushed and rubbed,
I am always sick and ailing, sore and tired.

"Yet I carry all the weight of the body, small and great,
But no one ever praises what I do.
I am always in the way, and 'tis I who hav to pay
For the folly and the pride of all of you."
Then the mouth and the brain and the hand said:
"'Tis plain,
Though troubled be our lives with woe,
The hardest lot of all does certainly befall
The poor little, humble little toe—
The rubbed little, snubbed little toe."

The Kansas Orphans' Home.

Situated just north of the city of Atchison, Kan., on one of the most commanding points in Eastern Kansas, is the Soldiers' Orphans' Home, an institution to which every Kansan points with a feeling of pride. The Home was founded in 1887, with Capt. John Pearson as superintendent. The first children admitted to the institution arrived July 1, 1887, and at the end of the first fiscal year there were one hundred and five children in the Home—fifty-nine boys and forty-six girls. There are at present almost two hundred children in the institution.

The present superintendent is Colonel Faulkner. He says that during his administration only one boy ran away that never returned. Only one child has died since Colonel Faulkner took charge, over six years ago, and that was a colored girl, who died with pneumonia. The children are naturally healthy, and everything combines to keep them in a healthy and robust condition. They are trained to be very regular in their habits, having a regular time for eating, sleeping, playing, bathing, and everything else. They are given a good wholesome diet, generally consisting of bread-and-butter, oat-meal, milk, onions, etc. Sometimes they are given a little mutton, and occasionally bacon. The location is a healthful one, which is another great advantage. One thing I forgot to mention is that the children are never allowed to drink tea or coffee.

The building, which is a large four-story brick structure, is very neatly and conveniently arranged. There are two large, spacious kitchens; two store rooms, in which provisions, dry goods, and all kinds of necessities are stored away; a large dining room, containing twelve immense tables; two regular school-rooms and one kindergarten; three tank rooms with big tanks which supply the water for general use; a uniform room, in which the boys keep their uniforms; four dormitories; several large bath rooms; a large play room for the boys, in which they indulge in games and pastimes during inclement weather; the girls' sitting room; several handsome parlors; the employees' dining room; the superintendent's private office and dining room; besides numerous closets, pantries, paint rooms, hallways, etc. Then there are the buildings outside—two good sized barns, one for horses, the other for cows; a hospital, which is rarely used; and a large shed-like structure, in which the children hav various entertainments and amusements. There are two fine wells, four cisterns, and several windmills on the place, besides an excellent spring. The Home is also provided with fourteen milk cows which during the past year produced about $826.65 worth of milk. The Home is situated on a one hundred and sixty acre tract of land, which is divided into eighty acres of timber and eighty acres of cultivated land. The land is particularly adapted to the cultivation of fruit and produce of all kinds. More than $1,000 worth of agricultural products are raised annually. The soil is well adapted to timothy and clover and much hay is put up on the place Among the fruits raised may be mentioned the blackberry, strawberry, raspberry, gooseberry, plum, grape, apple, pear, etc. A great many evergreens and other ornamental shrubs add to the beauty of the place.

The institution is provided with a library of at least one thousand volumes. It was named in honor of Col. John A. Martin, the brave Kansas soldier and statesman. Most of the books were donated by old soldiers, who take great pride and interest in the Home. The building is also equipped with a steam laundry, and machinery for supplying the building with gas. Many other improvements are contemplated providing the legislature makes the necessary appropriations.

There are only five colored children in the Home—one boy and four girls. The smallest child in the institution is little Melvin Nail, who is about five years of age. He is a very bright little chap and was a great favorit with the old soldiers at the Soldiers' Home, where he used to stay before he entered the Orphans' Home. It is interesting to look into the girls' sitting-room. You find them as busy as bees with their sewing and other work. Mrs. Faulkner, wife of the superintendent, is a very kind and hospitable woman, and the children fairly worship her. Whenever there is a public parade or demonstration in Atchison the children of the Home always participate, and they make a splendid showing. Picnics are often allowed the little ones in the fine grove near the Home, and they are occasionally taken away on fishing excursions. No pains are spared to make the children happy and contented at all times. They are taught to be patriotic, self-reliant, and industrious, and in fact there cannot be found in the country a more fitting example of the proper training of children than this Home affords. Correspondence.

CARLSBAD, CAL., July 18, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON AND CORNERITES: It has been a long time since I wrote to the Corner, but as my last was printed it gives me courage to try it again. The good Christians here in this place are in a wrangle over their church. The church in the first place was built by the townspeople—everybody donated something, money or work, and sometimes both, but after awhile the church goers got it in their names and then mortgaged it to some other denomination in another town above here. So they got notice to raise the price or they would take the church down. Well, of course they could not raise the necessary and they took it down. Now they are trying to take the organ and furniture, but that was bought after they had given the mortgage, and they say they will not giv it up. They hav it in a private building locked up, and are going to law about it. Let the good work go on. If they would get a mortgage on a few more, tear them down and not put them up again, we would hav a better country after awhile. The summer season has opened up here, but times are so hard there are not as many tourists as in years before. These are nice Democratic times. For fear of the waste basket, I will close.

From your Liberal friend,
CLINT CULVER.

PROVIDENCE, July 30, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As you are interested in educational matters you may be glad to hear that I hav been trying to gather up some of the loose ends of my education. I was four years old when I began to go to school. The school was kept by a maiden lady from Cape Cod. She put a primer into my hands, and I was told to study my lesson. It was about a little kid that stood on a box. "Can a kid stand on the box? Yes; a kid can stand on a box." I studied that kid well. I admired the grace and symmetry of his limbs, his bold and fearless pose, his large lustrous eyes; but when I espied the horns on his head, they appeared to my childish mind like a pair of battering rams sprouting from the top of his skull. My teacher called me up to recite. I read the lesson quite glibly and spelt kid all right. "And now, my little girl," she inquired, giving me a friendly pat on the head, "can you spell box?" "Oh, yes," I lisped, "I can spell that too, b o k, box" "No," said the teacher, "that is not right. I plainly see that you hav been looking at the kid too much; now go to your seat and look at the box more and at the little word that spells it. Study hard, and you will get so you can spell it as readily as you can kid." And my kind teacher, to further encourage me, told me that Rome was not built in a day. I felt grateful so her for that bit of information. Somehow it seemed to brace me up wonderfully, and I returned to my study of the kid on the box with renewed interest. I had heard something of a man by the name of Julius Cæsar, that he was a Roman of the Romans, one of the mighty ones of the earth, a man that was greatly looked up to, and I wondered if Mr. Cæsar, when a little boy, had for his edification and instruction to study a kid on a box.

"Imperial Cæsar dead and turned to clay, Might stop a hole to keep the wind away."

I will say for Miss Baker that she was a kind and faithful teacher and tried very hard to teach the young ideas how to shoot.

A little incident connected with my first term at school is still fresh in my memory. My mother had made me a pretty little sun-bonnet, trimmed it with ribbons and ruffles, so that it was a very tasty little affair. But I did not like to wear it. On my way to school I got into the habit of taking off my bonnet and throwing it down into the dirt and letting the cool breezes of heaven play over my heated brow. When it came to the knowledge of my mother, she took me and gave me a solemn spanking. I must hav been a terrible infant, a bold, defiant babe, and I was indiscreet enough to bawl out, "I don't care for that, mother; I don't care, you did not make me sting any way." "Very well," she said, "then I will repeat the dose," and she did so. The next time she made such a vigorous application of her slipper that I had no further remarks to offer. I was a sadder and somewhat wiser child, and with anger in my heart and tears in my eyes, I went out and made a mud pie, my favorit amusement in days of yore.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

CHURCH PROPERTY: SHOULD IT BE EXEMPT FROM TAXATION. Reasons Why It Should Not. Truth Seeker Co., New York. Price, 15 cents.

"If you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a tax upon the whole community" (James A. Garfield).

Not long since, a symposium on the question, "Why Don't You Go to Church?" was a leading feature in three successiv issues of the Sunday Herald, Chicago. Two of these issues hav been examined in Lucifer's office. That of May 13th contains 15 columns of reasons, from some sixty writers. That of May 20th contains 28 columns of letters by a proportionate number of correspondents giving reasons why they no longer attend a place of public worship. Though not often stated in so many words, the impression received by reading these letters is that a leading reason for non-attendance at church is that the moral atmosphere of these institutions is stifling and unwholesome; that the tendency of church association is not toward honesty, justice, and fraternity, but the reverse; that working-women and men, the real producers of all wealth, are coming to recognize the church as in league with their natural enemy, the plutocrat; that an institution which habitually shirks its equal share of public burdens, and which is notoriously the recipient of plunder stolen by rich robbers from its rightful owners, cannot be patronized by these victims of robbery without loss of all self-respect.

In his editorial closing the symposium the editor of the Herald uses the following very significant language:

"If it be true that but one-half of one per cent of Chicago's population goes to church, it is high time that church members were earnestly seeking the cause of the defection, which, if unchecked, must soon lead to annihilation of the church as at present organized."

The editor does not say that "but one-half of one per cent" go to church, but evidently considers the percentage very small.

Now the question naturally arises, Why should the non-church-goers, constituting the overwhelming majority of citizens in a so called free republic, be taxed millions upon millions of dollars for the benefit of church-goers, constituting a very small minority of such citizens?

As a contribution to the already large aggregate of literature demanding the abolition of unjust and unconstitutional privileges now usurped by the church, the book entitled, "Church Property—Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?" is one of the very best.—Lucifer.

This little book contains exhaustiv statistics of the property of the various churches and religious sects in the United States. Next are given the reasons why church property should be exempt from taxation. These reasons are critically examined and conclusivly proven to be of no value. It has been said that church property is non-productiv, and hence, as such, should not be taxed. This is untrue. First, a great part of the church property is highly productiv; and, secondly, as a mere justice also the non-productiv property should be taxed. It is furthermore stated that the churches render the commonwealth important moral services. All right; but there is no morality without justice; and it is an injustice when one exempts the property of one party, and thus creates an additional burden upon the remainder. Exemption from taxation of church property is furthermore in opposition to religious liberty, because through it a minority is compelled to pay indirectly a tax for the propagation of theologic opinions of the majority.—New York Staat-Zeitung.

PLEASURE AND PROGRESS. An attempt to Prove that the Pursuit of Pleasure is the sine qua non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that the Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship. By Albert M. Lorentz, LL B. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

In a pamphlet of four hundred pages entled "Pleasure and Progress," published by the Truth Seeker Company of New York, Albert M. Lorentz discusses the relation of man's appetites to his real enjoyments. He attempts to prove that the pursuit of pleasure is the sine qua non of intellectual, moral, and social development, and that the promotion of pleasure is the duty of philanthropy and statesmanship. The author covers a great deal of ground, and with sentences which are almost uniformly so short that they suggest the possibility of an effort to write blank verse, each line of which should end with a period. The author makes many statements of facts, only to lead up to conclusions which are open to question, and some of which are decidedly erroneous. For instance, he admits that civilized man has progressed to a greater liberty in religion and government than of yore, but says that "in commerce leaders are becoming absolute masters, and followers are becoming abject slaves. Wherever capitalism is in vogue the baleful influences of despotism are becoming apparent. Capitalists are beginning to rely for success less on ingenious contrivances and more on contraction of wages. The degradation of the workman is even more pronounced than that of the capitalist. All opportunities to advance are foreclosed. It is most emphatically true that the average worker cannot obtain a position that educates his noblest faculties. He fosters only the tractability of slaves." And much more to the same purpose.

But while the author seems to think the condition of the workingman tends to grow worse and that of the capitalist more dictatorial and oppressiv, he is entitled to the credit of repudiating Socialism as a cure for the evil. He says: "Socialism would rob diligence and reward indolence, impoverish frugality and enrich extravagance, despoil ingenuity and aggrandize stupidity. Diligence would hav to serve indolence, intelligence be enslaved to illiteracy, purity pander to obscenity, and dexterity drudge for awkwardness. Such a scheme is evidently fatal to progess. No one can fail to perceive this unless he is already steeped in Socialism. The trouble with Socialists is that they do not, like Hamlet, hesitate to fly to evils that they know not of. They see the suffering entailed by abandoning competence, but not the evils entailed by rewarding incompetence. They see the demoralization caused by fostering plutocracy, but not the injustice of plundering worth."—Chicago Tribune.

CHEAP EDITION.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Gems of Thought.

THE habit of worship is sacred only by inheritance.—Investigator.

So far as one can judge from the past, American politics has a fatal tendency to ruin any legitimate business on earth.—Galveston News.

IF the wretched are unknown or but vaguely known, all the demerits they may hav are ignored, and thus it happens that when the miseries of the poor are dilated upon, they are thought of as the miseries of the deserving poor, instead of being thought of as the miseries of the undeserving poor, which in large measure they should be.—Herbert Spencer.

PROTESTANT ministers cried out against Galileo's assertion of the earth's movement just as loudly as Catholic priests; indeed, it was observed that here, for the first time, ministers and priests agreed; and Descartes wrote that there was a good time coming for the theory of the earth's motion, as the priests would probably begin to allow it now that all the ministers condemned it.—Matthew Arnold.

SUPPOSE, for the sake of argument, we accept the inequality of the sexes as one of nature's immutable laws; call it a fact that women are inferior to men in mind, morals, and physique, why should this settle or materially affect the subject of so-called woman's rights? Would not this very inferiority be a reason why every advantage should be given to the weaker sex, not only for its own good, but for the highest development of the race?—Huxley.

THE business of the country is not carried on by political parties; it is based upon the resources of the continent, upon the farm, the forest, and the mine, and the daily toil of humble men. When the farmer of the South, feeling the airs of the warm Gulf, and looking out upon a whitening cotton field, cries in distress, and is answered by the Northwestern wheat grower, who stands upon his mortgaged farm, a hopeless debtor amid his golden sheaves, there are deep causes of trouble that only the shallow politician or the partisan of the hour would attribute to the changes suggested by an election.—John E. Russell.

TRUE morality can come only by material existence, and its exhibition in us only by living the laws of our material life. A sick body is never truly moral. To liv the laws of health is the road to morality. We hav two feet, two eyes, two ears, wherewith to walk, to see, to hear. To try to walk on one foot, to see with one eye, to hear with one ear, will not make for us our fullest enjoyment. Neither does one principle of the mind ridden to death. One note of the piano does not make the richest tone; a chord in unison makes sweeter music. The analogy is as complete for the fullest tones in the life of human action as in the instruments for his action.—R. J. Drummond, in Secular Thought.

CULTURE often miscarries. It piles its knowledge of fragments and details and fails to see the law by which the pile stands. It builds its mountain and misses the mountain's secret. It does not for one moment suspect that it has worked that it might at day's end mount the hill it has built and see the promised land. There are evil possibilities in culture which must not go unchallenged and unchecked. They throw discredit upon the human. They undertake to do their work apart from large social interests. The great streams pass by and the scholar fears to embark. Social benefit does not [always] find its origin in laboratories and libraries. The average professor, like the average priest, is subsidized, if not by his position, then by unconscious inclinations which defer the human call to artistic beauty or technical skill.—Horace L. Traubel.

WHAT marriage may be in the case of two persons of cultivated faculties, identical in opinions and purposes, between whom exists that best kind of equality, similarity of powers and capacities with reciprocal superiority in them, so that each can enjoy the pleasure of looking up to the other, and can hav alternately the pleasure of leading and of being led in the path of development, I will not attempt to describe. To those who can conceive it, there is no need; to those who cannot, it would appear the dream of an enthusiast. But I maintain, with the profoundest conviction, that this, and this only, is the ideal of marriage, and that all opinions, customs, and institutions which favor any other notion of it, or turn the conceptions or aspirations connected with it into any other direction, by whatever pretenses they may be colored, are relics of primitiv barbarism. The moral regeneration of mankind will really commence only when the most fundamental of social relations is placed under the rule of equal justice, and when human beings learn to cultivate their strongest sympathy with an equal in rights and cultivation.—John Stuart Mill.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene. Mene. Tekel of Socialism. Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject with out mu h thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us , object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, an i his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide read ng, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for its bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

RIGHTEOUS wife (at breakfast): "Henry, will you ask a blessing?" Henry (examining hash): "We've blessed everything here before, dear."—Life.

PARSON (after telling the story of the good Samaritan): "Why did the Levite pass by on the other side?" Bright Boy: "Because the man had been robbed already."

"I WAS surprised when I heard that Grabrox had joined the church." "I wasn't. I happened to be present when he and his business partner shook dice to see which member of the firm should join."—London Freethinker.

A CLERGYMAN tells this story. Leaving his parish, while on a holiday, in care of a locum tenens, a visitor to the parsonage one day inquired of the servant for the clergymen. This was Biddy's answer: "No, sir; the incumbrance is not at home, but you can see the local demons if you like."

ADAM was the only man in history who died before he was born; for he was never born at all; he was manufactured. He was full-grown the first day although he never grew at all; and St. Augustine contended that he was thirty years of age on the day of his birth. Adam never had a father nor a mother, and he was never a baby. He was an old stager from the beginning.—Wallace Nelson.

SYDNEY SMITH was sitting at breakfast one morning at Combe Florey, when a poor woman came begging him to christen her new-born infant without loss of time, as she thought it was dying. He instantly went to her cottage, and on his return was greeted by queries as to what state he had left the child in. "Why," said he. "I just gave it a dose of castor oil, and then I christened it; so now the poor child is ready for either world."—London Freethinker.

ON a recent Lord's day a five-year-old boy was visiting his grandparents, who are perfectly orthodox on Sunday observance. A Sunday newspaper had inadvertently been placed on the front doorstep. The child in innocent delight picked it up and handed it to his grandfather with the remark: "Here, grandfather, is the Sunday newspaper." His grandfather, in apparent surprise at the unusual visitor, said: "No, my child, grandpa doesn't read Sunday newspapers." "What!" said little Sidney, who had heard his grandpa say we should love the Sabbath and keep the day holy, "You think so much of the Sabbath, and won't read the Sunday newspaper. Why, my papa don't do very much for Sunday, but he reads the Sunday newspaper."—Christian Advocate.

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER AND MOSES.

Whin Pharaoh's daughter
Wint down to the water,
Shure, there was young Moses a swimmin' around,
Wid his basket all handy,
And a shtick of shwate candy,
To kape him from crying until he was found.
Says she to a Paythan:
"Bring here the young hathen;
Your trotters be shakin', ye lazy colleen.
If the wather once wets him,
Or the alligators gets him,
It's no crocodile tears ye'll be sheddin', I ween."
So whin from his swimmin'
He was brought to the wimmin',
Faith, it shows how the blarney's a female's chief joy,
A nate boy he was makin',
Just as sure as I'm spakin',
"Begorra," says she, "he's the broth of a boy." —University Courier.

OLD HYMN—NEW VERSION.

(Thoughts crossing the mind of the writer while hoeing potatoes and humming over an old Methodist hymn.)

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform;"
He sends along potato-bugs,
And whirlwind, hail and storm.

"Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never-failing skill,"
He herds the pesky critters there,
And sends them forth at will.

Ye hardy toilers, "courage take;
The clouds ye so much dread,"
Are millions of potato-bugs—
God's blessing on your head.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust him for his grace;"
Behind that cloud of buzzing things
He's laughing in your face.

"His purposes will ripen fast."
So will that ominous horde
Gobble up my small potato patch,
And I must thank the Lord.

"Blind unbelief is sure to err!"
Such nonsense gives me pain,
If God made bugs for any good
He'd better try again.
—C. Naylor, in Secular Thought.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

"With Daughter's Babe Upon His Knee."

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Travels in Faith.

BY CAPT. ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Being the story of his mental journey from orthodoxy to Rationalism.

Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished langnage, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

TOO THIN! TRYING TO WHITEWASH THE RECORD.

THE POPE: Maranatha! De whitewash no hida!

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies hav nearly all adjourned, but the people of the country will remain in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the fund and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

The common sense of the masses will some day revolt against the special privileges granted to the churches and demand the justice so long denied to the citizen. In London James Swan, a costermonger, noticing that the Salvation Army used big drums to advertise their business naturally concluded that he might increase his trade by the use of one of those instruments. He was promptly arrested and fined ten shillings and costs. Turning to the magistrate, he asked: "Why should the Salvation Army be allowed to make the hideous row they do with drums and tambourines if an honest cove like me mustn't do it to get a living?" His honor did not deem it expedient to make any reply. When a goodly number of "honest coves" get to asking such awkward questions here Sunday laws will become obsolete and the exemption of church property from taxation will soon be a thing of the past.

Liberty and Faith.

V. V. Rosanov, writing under the above heading in Russky Viestnik of St. Petersburg, makes some statements which call for critical comment by Freethinkers. He says that few ideas hav had the success which that of liberty has achieved in the last hundred years. "It has a magic sound for millions of people, and has dominated history." But the movement will not last long, he thinks. "It livs and dominates yet, but it does not create any longer." Then this follows:

"There is no living faith in liberty, and if this acknowledged corner-stone of our social order were shaken, no one would be moved to shed blood in its defense, no one would be impelled to make any sacrifices for it. It has been tried, and while nothing bitter has been felt, the taste has proved vapid and insipid. There is no keen relish in it. After ages of slavery, the feeling of freedom was akin to a physical sensation of a highly pleasurable kind; but now that liberty has been enjoyed for such a long period, there is no positiv pleasure in it. Nobody coerces or torments, it is true, but is this negativ fact that which humanity yearns for? While liberty meant emancipation from tyranny, secular or religious, it was a positiv thing; but now it is a mere abstraction and has no significance. What is there in it to unite and inspire men?"

What mean all the convulsions which now shake the political, social, and industrial worlds, if they are not struggles for wider liberty? To be sure, many of them are bad in method and their triumph would be the lessening of liberty, but this results from ignorance of what true liberty is and of the best means of securing it, not from hatred of or indifference to liberty. Neither is it true that liberty has been tried; only partial liberty has been attained by the people of any state, but, spite of the sordidness of the age, let the people of any nation once reach the conclusion that their institutions curtail and threaten the total alienation of their liberties and they will quickly enough shed their blood and make all needful sacrifices to regain and maintain their rights, if they are satisfied this cannot be accomplished through the agencies of peace. Liberty is not vapid and insipid to those who hav been able to partake of it beyond the few tantalizing tastes accorded by the rulers of the world.

Where was Mr. Rosanov looking when he wrote that "nobody coerces or torments" now? The assertion is so contradicted by facts that it does not need to be refuted in detail, and neither are we required to show that liberty still means emancipation from tyranny, both secular and religious. Liberty is not a mere abstraction. Equal freedom is yet to be achieved for the human race, and this great work unites and inspires all who believe that liberty of thought, utterance, and action is conduciv to happiness and will carry us onward to yet higher and more noble planes of living.

Again Mr. Rosanov:

"Liberty only means something where there is faith. The man who believes, naturally desires freedom to act upon and spread his belief, but for an age of unbelief there is in justice no liberty required."

This is foolish to a degree. If liberty means something only where there is religious faith, how does it come that the ages of faith were the ages of slavery, and that, broadly speaking, the ideal of liberty to-day is highest and most inclusiv where faith is weakest? And is there no faith but in the spooks of theology? May not free men and women hav faith in themselvs, in justice, in liberty, in the future of the race here on this earth? It is sufficient answer to say that they do and that this faith spurs them into constant and beneficent activity. Of course "the man who believes, naturally desires freedom to act upon and spread his belief," but in what must he believe to hav this desire? Only in the legends and ghosts of the dead ages? Certainly not; a man does not need to stand with his gaze constantly fixed upon the western horizon in order to express his wish to march toward the east. Mr. Rosanov talks glibly of "an age of unbelief" and of its asserted lack of any need of liberty, but he has not told us why an age which more than any preceding one believes in the almost infinit possibilities of progress should be assaulted with the epithet of "unbelief." It could as pertinently be said that the youth who has lost faith in the nursery tales which but a few years ago he believed to be true has become an "unbeliever" and hence has no desire for liberty and no yearning for it. The theologian has always arrogantly assumed that a man must accept his creed or sink into the abyss of black despair. Just why a human being should lose all hope and become careless of liberty because he has ceased to believe in miracles, no dogmatist has been able to tell. Mr. Rosanov should remember that

> "There livs more faith in honest doubt, > Believe me, than in half the creeds,"

As Tennyson puts it, but it might more truly be said that the sincere self-vaunted "believers" hav lost faith in everything except an irresponsible will throned in the cloudlands of imagination:

"For those who hav no belief, the demand for liberty is a senseless, chaotic demand, springing from a desire to crush the last traces of faith that still survive. It is clear that those who possess a living faith hav both the right and duty to brush aside this chaotic movement for a senseless freedom. The pessimists of all kinds, who are at one in their indifference, find it strange to be confronted with organized and, as it were, closed institutions like the church, state, family. Everything is 'open' to them, nothing is settled, and hence they want to see everything else in the same state. They cannot comprehend the life of the organism, and hence try to crush it."

We do not seek to crush religious faith through liberty. We wish, on the contrary, to be unmolested in the pursuit of our own ideals. If liberty of thought, expression, and life kills faith in the gods and devils, so much the worse for the gods and devils, and so much the more urgent need for liberty. If belief in them can survive only through the denial of equal liberty to all men and women, why should not all men and women hav liberty? A belief that can liv only in the atmosphere of slavery does not deserve to liv, and humanity will gain immeasurably by its destruction.

Mr. Rosanov defiantly affirms "that those who possess a living faith" in phantasms "hav both the right and duty" to kill liberty. This has always been the position of the church, although vast numbers of Christians at the present time shrink from an open avowal of the fact, and many of them hav really fallen away from the time-honored faith, but it has remained for a nineteenth century writer, who acknowledges that he is not in the church, to frankly argue that non-belief has no rights which belief is bound to respect.

Freethinkers quite easily comprehend "the life of the organism," but they are not prepared to admit that there can be any real social organism in the absence of liberty. An organism is a growth, and growth implies liberty to grow. Men held together by gyves and menaced with bayonets if they attempt to separate do not constitute an organism. Against such "closed institutions" we protest, and shall continue to protest, no matter how many National Reform Associations, Sabbath Unions, and kindred organizations antagonize us and strive to "brush aside" and crush us and liberty.

We quote two more paragraphs from Mr. Rosanov's article, to show just what the spirit of the reactionary party is, how little it would leave us of the liberty we hav now, and how inexorably it would refuse to grant u[illegible]ore freedom of speech and activity:

"Liberty for the development of truth and faith implies denial of liberty to unbelief and falsehood. There has been an extensiv propaganda in favor of 'freedom of conscience' to Nonconformist sects, and this demand is eagerly seconded by those who are utterly hostil to all religion. Now, the spirit of the church is doubtless the spirit of the highest liberty, but that liberty grows out of faith. But the liberty to antagonize the church, to spread unbelief, cannot be granted by faith. The church recognizes nothing antithetical to it, just as reason does not recognize unreason."

Read that first sentence again. Who is to decide what is the "truth" and what the "faith" to which liberty of propaganda is to be allowed? Who is seized of the infallible judgment which qualifies for the possession of the authority to suppress "unbelief and falsehood"? "The earth belongs to the saints—we are the saints." Such is the spirit of churchism, and there can be no doubt that the churchman believes that in the church is all truth and that she should hav ample power to destroy all who would antagonize the church by attempting to spread ideas not accepted by that monopolistic organization. This much we can readily understand, but we cannot comprehend how any honest man can say that the church which does this is at the same time the conserver of the "highest liberty." The institution which permits no liberty outside of its own pale is not possessed of "the spirit of the highest liberty," and cannot be other than the relentless enemy of equal liberty and of the impartial justice which is its essence.

Certainly no church which lays claim to the custodianship of a revelation embodying all truth can, logically, concede any rights to doubt or denial, but its defenders should be above the hypocrisy of arrogating to themselvs the title of champions of human freedom. "The church recognizes nothing antithetical to it," and therefore cannot recognize liberty. How fraudulent, then, must be the claim that she alone possesses the secret of true liberty, and is its only loyal defender! The church cannot be compared to reason, even were her creeds reasonable, for things unlike do not admit of comparison. The church is an organization formed to propagate certain dogmas, while reason is the name given to the mental process which evolves all dogmas, ideas, and systems of thought. Reason does not persecute unreason; it supplants it.

"The liberty and toleration that exist are not the concessions of faith and truth; but of imperfect men who allow unbelievers to spread their ideas in freedom because of a consciousness of lack of spiritual freedom in themselvs. We cannot resist the demand for toleration, but we are not the church, and in her, in religion, there is no toleration for irreligion. Toleration is a symbol of discord and dissolution, and its existence is the penalty this age pays for its indifference, skepticism, and loss of faith."

It is admitted that blind faith has granted neither liberty nor its counterfeit, toleration, but the more truth men hav discovered the more ready they hav become to concede that there may be many realms of verity which they hav not explored, and so they hav been willing to see others enjoy the same freedom of investigation which they desire for themselvs. No doubt they were and are "imperfect" men, for there are no others, but that they were or are conscious "of lack of spiritual freedom in themselvs" is not proven. At all events, the "spiritual freedom" which impels men to become the persecutors of their fellows—the only "spiritual freedom" which seems to hav been the "sweetness and light" of the church's inquisitors—is far better absent than present. The world can get along if the last vestige of it is extinguished.

Those who are disposed to think that the church has ceased to be dangerous, and that we may safely stop our fight against the theocrats, will find in Mr. Rosanov's paper food for serious thought. We must understand that the church does not willingly grant us liberty to criticise her, and that she will force her opinions upon us by the pressure of legal enactment whenever she can secure a political majority. We are foolish if we trust in the least to her generosity or sense of justice. The liberty we hav is the liberty we take. Her internal dissensions are our salvation, and the only hope of equal freedom.

An Outrage and One of its Apologists.

The New Orleans Times-Democrat has taken up the case of W. B. Capps, an Adventist of Dresden, Tennessee, who was fined for working in his field on Sunday. His case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the state and there the decision of the lower court was affirmed. The fine and costs amount to $110.45, which he must serve out in prison at twenty-five cents per day. Mr. Capps has a wife and four children, the eldest only six years of age, and one sick at the time of the father's imprisonment. The sentence means immurement in an unhealthful jail for one year and nearly three months. A physician states that Mr. Capps cannot liv there for that length of time. The Times-Democrat has started a fund to pay his fine, and we are glad to see that some of the New Orleans Freethinkers hav contributed to it, and we hope that more will add their dollars.

The Atlanta Constitution, which is usually nothing if not wrong, descants upon the case as follows, after quoting a part of the Times-Democrat's editorial:

"We cannot agree with our New Orleans contemporary. Leaving out the question of religion entirely, the state has the right to appoint a day of rest, and in the interests of public morals and public order it is a proper exercise of its police power to punish every violator of the Sunday laws. If we allowed farmers to work in their fields on Sunday because they had religiously observed Saturday as a day of rest, blacksmiths, mechanics, saloon-keepers, and merchants would soon claim the same right, and there would be no end of disorder in our cities and towns. Suppose the good people of Atlanta should wake up some Sunday morning and find a number of Seventh Day Adventists keeping open retail stores and hammering away on new buildings in the course of erection? The entire crowd would be arrested and fined, and very properly. We might pity the offenders and let them off lightly for the first offense, but the community would not stand such conduct."

The claimed right of the state "to appoint a day of rest" means, in plain words, that the state has a right to say when the citizen shall work, play, or attend church. This assumed right we flatly deny. The state possesses no rights not first possessed by the units of which it is composed. Rights not possessed cannot be delegated. No citizen has a right to say when his neighbor shall work or when he shall rest. So much for that pretense, but all people acquainted with the Sunday-law question know that it is only a pretense; Sunday laws always hav been and are religious laws, in fact, and were enacted in the interest of a class which gets notoriety and pay for working on Sunday.

"Public morals and public order" are catch words, used to deceive. No one's morals are damaged by freedom to work on Sunday, and the public has no morals, for "the public" is a fiction. The word is used to designate the aggregate of the membership of the community or the state, which, of course, has no morals apart from the morals of its units, which are, essentially, private, not public. As to the preservation of "public order," which means the protection of the individual's life, person, and property, no special Sunday laws are needed for that purpose, for general laws, applicable on all days, will do all that can be done by law. In fact, Sunday laws contravene the general laws for the protection of person and property. They are invasiv rather than defensiv, and so we oppose them.

The Constitution would punish farmers (who, as it is admitted, hav not disturbed the quiet of their neighbors) for working on Sunday, lest their example should encourage some city residents to engage in noisy occupations on that day. This is equivalent to a proposition to shut all people off the streets when church services are in progress because it is feared that some possible drunken man will enter a church and interfere with the exercises.

Who need be disquieted in Atlanta if they should find some of the retail stores open on Sunday morning? Who would be compelled to make purchases? Why should not the merchant who gets sufficient trade on that day to pay him for keeping open do so? Who is injured? Will he make more noise than the church bells? Do you say that he has the advantage over his Sunday-keeping neighbor? Perhaps, if the Sunday observers do not boycott him the rest of the week, but so has, presumably, the merchant who opens his place earlier on Monday morning and closes it later at night than his rivals do theirs. Would you, therefore, decree that all stores should open and close at the same hour morning and evening? If not, why not? Did the Constitution never see confectionery stores, news stands, meat markets, bakeries, and hotels open in Atlanta on Sunday? Do no street cars run? And if these contributors to comfort minister to human needs on Sunday, why should not others, if there is a demand for such service? All persons should be free to rest on the day that they prefer for that purpose and none should be compelled by law to abstain from work on any day that they choose to labor.

A Sunday Law Row.

New Canaan, Connecticut, is in a turmoil. The grand jurors run things in the villages of that state, and one of them, E. L. Arnold, has set out to enforce in New Canaan the old blue laws of the commonwealth. In the local paper of the 4th inst. Mr. Arnold warned all business men that thereafter they must keep their places of business closed between twelve o'clock Saturday night and twelve o'clock Monday morning. Three years before this man Arnold had been expelled from the Methodist church for selling papers on Sunday. He is now trying to show his repentance by persecuting other business men. But the Sunday shop-openers defied him and the musty old blue law by attending to their regular duties on Sunday. A newsdealer, a barber, a butcher, three livery stable keepers, and two druggists were among those arrested. Taken before Justice of the Peace J. H. Silliman, they were fined from four to six dollars each. Mr. Silliman, who is the leading grocer, is accused of bringing produce from his farm and selling it in New Canaan on Sunday. Under the law all amusements are forbidden and the victims of the present raid may proceed to make the statute odious by securing the arrest of all summer residents who drive in their own carriages, and also of the lawn tennis players. Juror Arnold hopes the town will "keep quiet" and that there "won't be any trouble," as though he had not already destroyed quiet and made trouble by his outrageous interference with the private affairs of his neighbors. That is the usual way with sneaks and despots; they are terribly shocked when those who suffer from their rascality "make a fuss."

On the Sunday (August 19th) following that on which the arrests just mentioned were made, most of the arrested persons and others defied Juror Arnold and his resurrected statute. The New York Times says that when its correspondent drove into the town "Newsdealers Stephen E. Ruscoe and F. A. Dickerman were doing a thriving business in New York morning papers;" two drug stores were open; Barber William Patterson was busy; Baker Barton was "dealing out bread," and three livery firms "were ready to bargain for turnouts, first asking a customer if he was engaged in an errand of mercy, the answer always being in the affirmativ." Will the Sundayites assume responsibility for the lies their contemptible meanness forces people to tell in order to be unmolested in their legitimate business?

"S. W. Nichols, assistant editor of the Weekly Messenger, sat, with door wide open, preparing copy for the next issue, and assured the correspondent that he was not afraid of arrest."

Good for the knight of the quill! Juror Arnold said that as long as summer visitors "behaved themselvs quietly" they would not be troubled, and he told the newsdealers they would not be bothered if they got through by 10 o'clock in the morning.

"'But,' said the correspondent, 'the law says that business places must close on Sunday. What right hav you or any other grand juror to limit the hours of a man's work or to say when and in what manner he shall go driving?'

"'Oh, I guess our association can fix that. John Light says it is good law, and they hav done it over in South Norwalk, so we will do it, or the offenders will be fined every time.'"

That is the way such bigot's statutes enable little local gods to play fast and loose with justice and equal freedom. If the law was impartially enforced, Raymond, who serves the writs, would be arrested and fined for playing the church organ on Sunday. But of course the church is exempt from all laws it gets enacted for the government and robbery of the people.

We want copies of the "Ingersoll-Black Discussion." Will either pay cash or exchange new books. Address TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE.

The committee on charities of the New York Constitutional Convention has unanimously reported adversely on all proposed amendments forbidding appropriations from the state to charitable institutions under sectarian control. We shall hav something to say about some of the arguments in this report in future issues.

"When a man begins to put the rotten apples in the bottom of the measure, how soon he begins to conclude that the Bible is a failure!"—Ram's Horn.

Yes, it does seem that it fails to make or keep him honest. But what can you expect of a book which tells him to sell rotten meat to the stranger? It is so easy to reason that the permission includes decayed fruit.

"It is the patience and toleration of the disinherited, not their cruelty or vengeance, which strikes us as among the most wonderful of moral facts."—Chronicle, London, England.

Are you sure that you are dealing with a "moral" fact? Is it not ignorance which holds the people in subjection to superstition and tyranny? If so, we are confronting an intellectual instead of a moral fact.

We are pleased to see evidences of the prosperity of our London contemporary, the Freethinker. It has recently donned a new dress throughout, and presents a most neat and attractiv appearance. Mr. Foote and his assistant, J. M. Wheeler, with such staff writers as Frederick Ryan, Charles Watts, and W. Heaford, are maintaining the always enviable reputation of the Freethinker. It prints only the best matter and hence is always a most creditable representativ of the Freethought cause.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week write again to United States District-Attorney W. C. Perry, Topeka, Kansas, asking him to nolle prosse the suit against J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas, indicted for sending through the mails to Rev. H. B. Vennum a postal card upon which was written a passage from the Bible. Show that the continued persecution of Mr. Wise is invidious and impolitic, inasmuch as the Bible societies which send out millions of copies of the Bible are not molested, and such partiality will arouse in the minds of the people a suspicion which will soon ripen into a conviction that the laws against obscenity are intended to reach only the poor and those who hold unpopular views on the subject of religion.

Mr. Putnam appears to hav made a good impression at Fargo, North Dakota. This is what the Daily Forum of that place says about his recent lectures there:

"The series of Liberal lectures by Mr. Putnam in the Unitarian church closed last evening with one on Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Freethought. While, as the speaker stated, many of his audience did not agree with him on some points advanced, the lectures hav been remarkable, and furnished abundant food for thought. The idea advanced last evening upon the dignity of labor was a beautiful one and should encourage every one to perform his daily duties cheerfully and with more zest than before. These lectures were very largely attended and closely listened to by every one in the room."

"Four Hundred Years of Freethought" still challenges and receives subscriptions at the rate of $5 per volume or $6.50 for the book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. We hav the names of these new subscribers to report: Dr. A. J. Gillis, Pennsylvania; N. Philibirt, Kansas; H. F. Speiser, North Dakota; Leger Meyer, North Carolina; Wm. Münch, Minnesota; L. F. Keim, Montana.

We are pleased to learn that Miss Wixon's latest work, "Right Living," has been adopted for use in the public schools of Sutton, Massachusetts, as authority in ethical instruction. And Mr. S. S. Croker, a well known educator, himself formerly a teacher, writes to the author: "I hav read your last book, 'Right Living.' I like it; it is an inspiration; it is just like its author. The definition of education in 'Right Living' is by far the best I hav ever seen, and, when you said 'Right doing makes right living,' you struck the right note, Miss Wixon. I hav put your excellent book into the hands of my boys, Ralph and Clinton, that by it they may learn, while life is new, the noblest of the arts—Right Living. If it helps them as it has helped me, I shall hav double cause for thankfulness."

In Denmark there is such an epidemic of self-destruction that it has been proposed to turn over the bodies of all suicides to medical colleges for dissection. The fear of hell being no longer a sufficient deterrent it is hoped that the aversion to after-death mutilation on earth will prove an effectiv check. The hope is a vain one. The London Freethinker remarks that "the improvement of the condition of the living is the one thing needful." This is an error, if reference is had only to the bettering of material circumstances. The decrease of poverty would of course lessen the number of suicides due to that cause, but not even universal physical comfort will prevent the recurrence of epidemics of suicide as well as the eruption of other "epidemic delusions" so long as the imitativ instinct is so strong in the race. Men and women must become self-centered, which implies, necessarily, the elevation of the average of intelligence. And even this will not prevent the self-destruction of the hopelessly diseased, the crippled, and the very aged who are helpless, for these classes will more and more rebel against useless suffering.

Although the village hall at Saratoga Springs is occupied Sunday evenings by the Young Men's Christian Association, the Christians were much disturbed and began to talk about the rights of taxpayers when it was announced that Colonel Ingersoll would deliver his lecture, "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," in said hall. A local correspondent of the Saratogian protested that this was "Sabbath desecration of the most abominable character," and "blasphemy against the Lord of the Sabbath and his revelation to man;" Ingersoll was called a "ribald scoffer and blatant Infidel," and liberty was said to be "running riot" because "a hall paid for by Christian voters" was to "be occupied on the Lord's day by one who makes insane mirth at the expense of the most cherished and sacred convictions of the centuries." Considering the fact that the lecture, "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," is a splendid plea for justice, generosity, and kindness, and the further fact that Colonel Ingersoll wings most of his shafts of wit and satire against the horrible dogma of an eternal hell, the rhapsody of the correspondent about "the most cherished and sacred convictions of the centuries" seems a little out of place, and sounds like a bad example of anti-climax.

"'The creation of crimes by means of statutes providing for their punishment has generally proved itself bad policy.'

"This is subjected to an analysis by the Voice, and interpreted as meaning, 'if it means anything, that all penal laws are bad policy.'"

It does mean something, but it does not mean what the Voice interprets it to mean. Crimes per se do not need creation by statute; they are crimes whether the law does or does not recognize them as such. On the other hand, the law often designates as a crime an act which is not a crime in the nature of things. Such, for instance, are all offenses against the sanctity of Sunday. Such, in the past, were all blasphemy and witchcraft laws. Such, today, are the laws which enable our delectable Society for the Cultivation of Mendicancy, alias the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, to arrest and punish children and their parents because the former are trying to support themselvs by honest labor. There are thousands more similar statutes which punish as crimes acts which are not crimes, and the Voice is anxious to increase the number of such enactments. No wonder that it tries to darken counsel and confuse judgment by arguments of which the before quoted "analysis" is a fair sample.

Did some optimist say that the Protestant church of to-day is largely free from gross superstition and that the dogma of hell-fire punishment is practically dead? The Methodist is the most numerous and the wealthiest division of Protestant Christianity in the United States. One of its most important auxiliaries is the Epworth League, a society of young people, which is doing a great educational work among the children of Methodists and others. Under the department head of "Epworth League" in a contemporary, in a "Theme for Prayer Meeting" from the parable of the tares, we find many gems of profound thought. The children are told that "reciting parables is spiritual portrait-painting," and that "true preaching is sowing gospel seed," which makes the young Christian responsible for these, among other things:

"The use of authorized seed. The gospel. Neither more nor less. Away with politics and political economy in our pulpits!

"Christ speaks of the pernicious influence of an 'enemy.' This is Satan, operating as a diabolical trinity in unity.

"Satan is the chief of wicked spirits. Very powerful. (See Job.) Almost omnipresent by means of his subalterns. The embodiment of malignity. 'Hath great wrath.'

"The world. Satan the owner. Offered to give it to Christ. He manipulates it to his advantage.

"The flesh. Is Satan's beast of burden. . . .

"On the last day God will appropriately dispose of the tares, as well as the wheat. The former shall be burned. Shall be precipitated into the bottomless pit, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. The wheat will be gathered into God's barn."

Is it really so, Mr. Radical Optimist, that we are "assaulting the dead" when we criticise the Bible and antagonize the schemes of the churches?

The Christian Advocate, Methodist, agrees with the Christian Reformer, Covenanter, that the preservation of the Christian Sabbath "is the only way . . . of perpetuating the republic itself," but the Methodist organ, unlike the Covenanter, evidently has little faith in law to secure the result desired. It says:

"Physical force alone will avail little or nothing. Arguments drawn from mere expediency will prove insufficient. If we rely upon these, and disregard the sacred character of the day—in other words, the religious element of the institution—the American Sabbath must inevitably perish. Conscience is the only effectual means to counteract anti-Sabbath sentiment. Since this is so, it becomes the imperativ duty, especially of the home and the church, to teach that the basis upon which the Sabbath rests is divine."

Dr. Buckley does not here state whether he will or will not in the future, as he has in the past, defend the rightfulness of Sunday laws, but he leaves us to infer that his want of faith in such laws is caused by their inadequacy rather than by their injustice. If he believes, as he avers, that "the basis upon which the Sabbath rests is divine," how can he favor civil laws to secure its observance without favoring the union of church and state, something which he says is not associated with the Sunday recognition that he advocates? When, in another part of the same article, he speaks disparagingly of the classes that denounce our Sunday statutes as "oppressiv and tyrannical," he must be understood to imply that he does not consider those statutes oppressiv and tyrannical. But if "physical force will avail little or nothing," why continue, by persisting in the resort to physical force, making enemies for a cause that is strong only, as he declares, when it is intrenched in conscience? Why not giv up the admittedly ineffectual struggle to coerce non-observers of Sunday, and try the effect of the teaching without which, he says, the American Sabbath cannot be saved?

The Strange Ways of Divine Providence.

The Cafe Roche is a popular resort in one of the most frequented boulevards of Paris. It is entered directly from the street by a large door in the middle of the front, and has broad windows on each side of the door. Inside is a large space handsomely floored in mosaic, with a profusion of mirrors on the walls, the usual array of tables, chairs, and newspapers on file. Just to the left on entering one sees the cashier's spacious desk, whereat is seated the pleasant-faced Madam Roche, with a smile of recognition ever-ready for the habitues of the place. On the counter stand two fine and highly-polished silver vases in which are deposited the gratuities of the waiters, and in the reflecting surfaces of which madam can see her own cheerful features as effectually as in a mirror. It was an unusually warm and bright spring day, and, with the door thrown wide open, and both the large windows swung open on their pivots, and standing out at right angles to the street, the place had a bright, summery, open-air aspect. People were beginning to flock in for their dejeüner; a miscellaneous assortment, bourgeoisie, professionals, artists, journalists, etc., an epitome of the world of life. Can anything be more typical of the extent to which the French carry the personal right of everyone to all the externals of politeness than the entree to an ordinary restaurant. Madam knows personally the majority of those who come, and for such has a pleasant smile and a few sociable words in reply to the necessary salute. The stranger entering, raises his hat to her, equally with the personal acquaintance. No matter what brutalities of life may exist under the surface, all the external signs of respect and self-respect are given and taken with the politest of airy grace.

Enter Madam Brissot and daughter. "Ah! 'tis you; you are early, Madam." "Yes, my husband has gone out of town, and to console little Louise we are going sight-seeing to the Louvre, so we started early." "How goes it with the mother-in-law?" "Oh, she is inconsolable, but I won't giv way. I won't hav the child baptized. You know I think the church a huge deception." "Yes, I am of your opinion. Pierre, Pierre, a table for Madam Brissot."

"Ah, 'tis M. Vallon! How was it at the opera last night?" "Oh, the debutante was superb!" "Wait a minute, doctor. Tell me about those poor patients of yours. Is the sick feather-worker living still?"

Doctor Goulet, who is an Atheist with one of the finest practices in Paris, spends a great deal of time and money on poor and unknown patients, who adore him and call him blessed. Madam Roche is a great aid to him, sending anywhere, at shortest notice, delicacies and supplies for his poorer class of patients, and grudges no expense where the want is intimated by the good doctor. Between them, and unknown to any but themselvs, they hav soothed the way to death of many of the helpless and stricken, and many more hav been helped back to life and their place in the world by these two silent-working worldlings.

As they talk madam bows to M. Malparle, the cruel critic, and banters him as he passes with, "Say, old gourmand, try the game pie—it is fine to-day!" He passes and seats himself at table with M. Riche, a wealthy financier who has made his money by all sorts of notoriously shady transactions and wrecked more homes than anyone could tell of, and who is Madam Roche's pet aversion.

"See," she says to the doctor, "how the birds of prey gather together. They thieve and plunder, and always escape too. If this place were blown up with dynamite, like the Cafe Grand, those two would be among the saved."

The next moment a terrible explosion was heard, with shrieks of women, cracking of wood, and fall of broken glass; a terrible concussion of the air, with suffocating clouds of smoke. Everywhere was confusion, terror, and destruction. Another bomb had exploded in the Cafe Roche and all Paris was thrown into convulsions of excitement. When the police had taken possession of the place and the helpers began to gather up the dead, among them were the good doctor and little Louise Brissot, the unbaptized child. Among the living, sure enough, were M. Malparle and M. Riche.

There were the usual police blunders over the affair. Ever so many obviously innocent people were arrested and put to great inconvenience and annoyance and then dismissed. Everybody was satisfied that it was an Anarchist outrage, and all the suspects in the suspected quarter were "investigated" by the police and their spies. At last, through some indiscretion on his own part, the guilty man was found, tried, and sentenced to the guillotin. The misguided man who, in his madness over real social evils, had in his turn caused worse evil in the sacrifice of innocent lives, became "converted" by the priest who attended to the "spiritual wants" of the jail. Before he was executed he had "made his peace with God" and gone through the necessary forms to make him a member of the "only true church."

Some days after the execution Father Perrault dined with M. Mery, the rich manufacturer, at a small town in the neighborhood of Paris. M. Mery, besides being an Atheist and a friend of Dr. Goulet, who had been killed in the explosion, was also a large employer of labor and interested in the affairs of the little town. So he and the cure being thrown together in public life came to be on friendly terms. The cure could not afford to be at outs with M. Mery, even if he were a wicked libre penseur. Besides, who has such a scent for good dinners and fine wines—who can so well hold the candle to the devil as your country cure? And he dropped dark hints to his friends encouraging the idea that good might come to mother church some day from his association with the large-hearted manufacturer. She had gathered into her fold subjects much less likely than M. Mery, and besides there were madam and the young ladies. And, truth to tell, much good work was done in the town through the cure by and with the funds supplied by M. Mery. The church reaped the credit and the cure assured his objectors that he never swerved from his doctrins in his conversations with the follower of the "man of sin." To do the cure justice, he was so bent on justifying himself on the latter point by holding sharply orthodox views that M. Mery sometimes thought him more intolerant than he really was. Of late the cure had talked to his parishioners a great deal about the terrible bomb explosion at the Cafe Roche as a sign of the violence and self-will that must be rampant whenever the direction of worldly affairs was taken out of the hands of the holy church. God, in his providence, ordered things in the world to work out his own ends; he was all-knowing and knew best what was good for us in the long run. True, it did sometimes seem as if there were want of aim in some things that happened, but then it was our duty to take things as he ordered them, and to remember that what we did not understand of his ways was to be regarded as a mystery and, as such, appealed to our faith and not to our reason. The holy father should be our guide. To him had been confided the direction not only of the spiritual faith, but also of the reason. Faith was the highest ideal in man and reason subordinate to it. When men abandoned faith and appealed to reason, see the result—dynamite and Socialism, confusion and disorder in society. Let men hav faith and all would go well. Some of his hearers urged that the "age of faith" was notoriously dark and disorderly—that it was not noted for its peace or order. Knowing ones shook their heads and intimated that with all his want of faith M. Mery seemed to be a very good man; he even had more influence than Father Perrault himself. Ah, that was owing to his wealth! Yes, but why did God prosper him, with his want of faith, with his use of reason? There was M. Pellaton, down in the little town, in the same trade as M. Mery, his rival in fact. He had a good start years before M. Mery, and M. Mery began with nothing. M. Pellaton was a good Catholic, a dutiful son of the church, and as for faith, he was full of it. True, some folks said he had so much faith that it made him stupid. At any rate, God prospered M. Mery, and M. Pellaton was getting poorer every day. M. Pellaton was a sore point with the cure; he could only shrug his shoulders in reply.

Well, as we said, on this day Father Perrault dined with M. Mery. The dinner passed off as usual in good-humored talk; and when the ladies had retired the two men remained talking about town matters and people of mutual interest. After a while M. Mery rang the bell for the room to be cleared, and the two went out through the long French window down the steps into the pleasant old garden. Very often, in their discussions, they used to banter one another on religious subjects, and sometimes, could his parishioners hav heard him, they might hav been shocked at Father Perrault's light handling of such subjects where he knew he was safe. Once M. Mery had shown him a large nectarin tree trained on a wall; the tree was dying back branch by branch, and Father Perrault said nothing but the church could save it. He would make it all right again by blessing it if M. Mery would giv him perpetual tithes on it. Mery professed to want to beat the price down to five per cent instead of ten per cent on the ground that being a manufacturer, he was entitled to trade prices, but at last the tithe was agreed upon. As the tree did not recover, M. Mery insisted that the priest must hav cursed instead of blessed it. Father Perrault thought that they would hav to hav a mass said for the good of its soul, and they bargained over the price. In the meanwhile the gardener had cut back the dead wood, and treated the tree in his own fashion, and after awhile it had recovered, and again seemed to promis a good result. So the two men used to go and look at it and poke fun at one another's ideas. The priest speculated as to how much his first year's tithes would come to, but Mery argued that all the credit would belong to the gardener, because he did what he knew to be necessary, whilst Father Perrault speculated and theorized about what he knew nothing about, and when some one else had brought about a good result, came in and said, like his church: "See what my blessing and praying and masses can do!"

To-day, as they stopped in front of the tree, a little of the old persiflage passed between them, but M. Mery did not seem so good humored as usual; his gibes at the priest seemed to be harsher and more earnest in tone. The cure began to think back to find whether he had said anything at which his host might hav taken offense. But he could not arrive at any such conclusion. He changed the subject as they walked on, and gradually they began to talk of the topics of the day, politics, news and so on, till the cure at last referred to the horrors of the bomb explosion at the Cafe Roche. Then M. Mery became pugnacious and referred to the priest's utterances on the subject in the town, which the latter proceeded to defend and enlarge upon. M. Mery listened, at first occasionally interjecting a pugnacious word or two; but as the priest continued, Mery's manner and tone changed, until at last he said, with a gentler and pleading manner, "Oh, it's horrible, horrible, to hear a man, such as I know you to be, talk so, and there can be only one explanation of it. Once within the pale of the church, and at the church's call, the priest, no matter how good the man's nature, will overshadow the man in the interest of the church. The influence is so subtle, so far-reaching, so fatally blinding, that though you feel it and act upon it, you do not yourself know or even suspect that it exists. Perrault, Perrault, I know that you are an honest man, even if you are a priest; but it is the church and her dogmas that speak through you; you, yourself, from your own nature, could never utter such blasphemies against your God." Perrault had never seen him so much in earnest. His church training showed itself at once in the quickness with which he disclaimed the manliness Mery credited him with and assumed the tone and manner of the priest.

Mery continued: "It is not what you say about the wickedness of such deeds of violence as the affair of Cafe Roche that we are in disagreement about. There we are at one. But you will keep on claiming that your God interests himself and interferes in the affairs of man and directs them toward good ends; in short, that he is a watchful and guiding providence. This affair ought to teach you differently."

Then they carried on an animated discussion as to what had become of those who had died in the explosion at the Cafe Roche, Mery assuming, for the sake of argument, that there was a future life for them. Pressed for a real statement of his belief, the cure maintained that the criminal, having repented and put on faith as an armor and made his peace with God, would be received into heaven; but that the child could not be because she had not been baptized; nor could Dr. Goulet be, because not having been baptized, he was also a disbeliever in God, and Jesus has said that "whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father" Mery contended that if the religious conception of God as a being all-powerful, all-knowing, just, merciful, kind, and directing events for the benefit of his children were true, then the cure's ideas were degrading to such a conception. Such a being would hav better shown his good will if he had prevented the explosion; he could hav done so if he had wanted; as he did not, how could he be the kind and beneficent being he was represented to be? Indeed, he could only be either indifferent or else cruel. On the other hand, if he did wish to prevent it and could not, he was not all-powerful. Perrault replied that being all-powerful he could hav prevented it—that he did not for a moment doubt; but as he had not prevented it, we must suppose it was for some good purpose of his own. Mery went on to point out the scandal that was involved in the further details of the affair. Dr. Goulet and little Louise Brissot would be condemned to hell, to everlasting torture; yet both were admitted to be faultless except in wanting faith. Yes, the doctor was a good man, but he could not be saved, as he had not believed; the criminal who had caused the deaths, having repented, could go to heaven! Mery took the case of the little girl by itself. Whose fault was it that the child had not faith and had not been baptized? "Undoubtedly the fault lay with the mother, the child had nothing to do with it. Except that it had not been made one with God it was blameless; and even here it was blameless, as the blame, if any, lay entirely with the mother. The mother still lived. The child, having been consigned to hell, could the mother, if she now repented and made her peace with God, be saved and inherit the everlasting life? Undoubtedly she could. Then what a degraded idea of the divine justice, of God's infinit pity, the priest must hav! A blameless child could go to hell through the fault of her mother; the mother, through repentance and faith, might go to heaven; from there, across the great and impassable gulf described by Luke, she may see her child in torment, her child in hell through her neglect, and yet herself partaking of the joys of heaven! What nonsense you teach! To any mother such a heaven could be nothing but hell itself. To any manly and reasoning man a God arranging things so could be only a fiend. Then take the criminal himself, he who caused the explosion. He is too wicked to be allowed to liv on earth, and yet for his repentance and faith your creed givs him the entrance into heaven; and those good people, the doctor and the child, whom this fiend's sudden act deprived of any chance to work out their own salvation, they go to hell! A man too bad to be allowed to liv on earth, by his faith can be made good enough to go to heaven! A man good enough to be allowed to liv on earth, so good as to be regretted when he is gone, cannot, for his want of faith, be made good enough to go to heaven! Bah! your conception of divine Providence is ridiculous, and it is only your priestly allegiance to the church that could make a man like you defend it."

Here their discussion was interrupted by the arrival of the ladies. Mery and the priest continued good friends personally, but it was noticeable that Mery thereafter became more combativ, and that his change of attitude took the shape of organizing institutions to neutralize the immoral teachings of the church, instead of trying to do good work through wrong channels. CHAS. B. COOPER.

Mr. Peck and the Tariff.

An experience of many years as an extensiv breeder of poultry has assured me that the attack in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 28th, of which I was the intended victim, instead of resulting in a dangerous bite, proved to be only a Peck, savage but harmless. Viewing my assailant from a position of perfect security, I was enabled to make three important discoveries, to wit:

1. That, apart from a few absurd illustrations, Mr. Peck has not advanced an original argument, nor one that has not been refuted a little more than a million times;

2. That his contempt for facts is a little greater than is usually found, even among free traders, dealing as he does in theories only; and

3. That while some theories hav the merit of being founded on facts, those of Mr. Peck are not included in this class, founded as they are upon a fallacy too transparent to cast a shadow.

This fallacy is well expressed in Mr. Peck's own words: "This tax, whatever it may be, is added to the price of the goods, and is ultimately paid by the consumer." Upon this rotten dogma rests every argument he has produced, and with it every argument falls. How any sane man can longer be deluded by this glaring fraud is a problem which St. Peter alone can solve.

The statement above quoted contains a pair of assertions unsustained by a reasonable theory, unsupported by a single fact, as absurd as the plagues of Egypt, untenable as the geology of Moses, assertions that hav been refuted a thousand different times, in a thousand different ways, by a thousand different facts. Argument that consists of theory and fancy is simply no argument.

I call upon Mr. Peck for facts instead of theories. I call upon him, or any other free trader living, to name a half dozen protected articles which are not cheaper to-day than when they were free of duty. I call upon him to point to one dollar that he has ever been taxed or ever been obliged to pay by a protectiv tariff.

If he does not know the difference between the protectiv and the revenue tariff, he must be informed that the latter class would include such duties as might be levied upon articles that we cannot produce, or at least in quantities too small to hav any appreciable effect on supply and demand, such as tea, coffee, sugar, spices, etc.

I call upon him to explain why Europe is so anxious for free trade in America; why, in the early days of the Wilson bill, foreign representativs before the House finance committee sought the removal of duties from their particular products; why, when asked by the committee whether they or their American consumers paid said duties, they replied without exception that not one cent was paid by consumers. I call upon him to say whether they were fools or liars.

I call upon him to explain why M. D. Harter objects to a Cuban tariff on American flour. According to Mr. Peck, Cuban consumers would hav to pay it, so why should Mike object? American millers know better than this, if Mr. Peck does not.

I call upon him to explain his arithmetic. If the present price, including tariff, is less than former price without tariff, is it not a queer kind of addition? If Mr. Peck can pay duty and get three pounds of wire nails for the same price that he paid for one pound without duty, can he not stand that kind of taxation?

Our friend of Naples, N. Y., is not so stupid as he would hav us believe.

The New York Sun declared, and Mr. Peck well knows, that during the first two years of the McKinley law the prosperity of the United States was greater than was ever previously enjoyed by any country or any people living under the light of civilization, that our foreign trade was greater than ever before, and that the output of American industries was nearly equal to the combined product of the rest of the world.

He also knows that from the day of Cleveland's election this prosperity began to fail. Manufacturers began to put out their fires, the wheels of industry stopped, thousands of families were deprived of their incomes, and grim Poverty stalked where his presence was never before known.

A party pledged to the destruction of the McKinley law had been elected to power, and America began to prepare for that unhappy result. Mr. Peck also knows that if the present peril of the McKinley law could be removed, that is, if the present Congress could be dissolved, or would adopt a resolution that it would make no tariff changes whatever, and that existing tariff laws would remain untouched, business would begin to revive at once.

At this date (August 6th) it is impossible to say what will be the final result, but mark this prediction: Should all tariff legislation by the present Congress be defeated, general improvement in business will be visible in every direction in less than one month from the date on which such defeat is made certain, and ere long the entire land will regain its former prosperity. On the other hand, should the Wilson bill become a law, times will be harder than he has ever known.

I hav always admired Mr. Peck as a man of great ability. He has cast off the yoke of Jesus Christ, but still grovels under the heel of Adam Smith. He cannot see that the same means which compel the widow to pay an extra dollar for coal will compel the Americans, under free trade, to pay extra dollars for European goods. He cannot see that the free admission of foreign goods will hav precisely the same effect on American wage earners as will the free admission of foreign laborers, though in a much greater degree.

He labors under the delusion that American machinery is vastly superior to that of Europe, but had he carefully examined the machinery department at the World's Fair he would not hav ventured such a statement.

The writer spent one day in that department, which was more interesting to him than any other exhibit, and having some knowledge of mechanical principles, both mathematical and practical, I place my judgment against that of Mr. Peck, that he is sadly in error on this point.

I hav none but the kindest wishes for Mr. Peck and the entire TRUTH SEEKER family.

Locust Corner, O. CHAS O. HAYS.

To the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of July 28th is an article by John Peck on the tariff question. With your permission I will make comments on a few sayings contained therein.

Will Mr. Hays please explain how a tariff on coal makes it come cheaper to the widow?

This question is put at the end of a variety of doleful remarks concerning the poor widow. The schedule of my copy of the tariff states that there is not and has not been any tax on household coal. The duty is placed only on soft coal, which is unfit for domestic use by either rich or poor, and is burned exclusivly by steamers, blacksmiths, and factories. Although this fact precludes the idea of sympathizing in the matter of household coal for the poor, it is intimated by Mr. Peck that they are heavily taxed in the cost of their living by tariff duties on other articles not specified.

Right here would be the place to show that a free trade tariff is more burdensome on the poor than a protectiv tariff, but I am reminded that such a showing would not touch Mr. Peck's line of argument. According to his theory free trade duties and protection duties are alike dishonest; they are equally iniquitous. He believes in unqualified, absolute free trade; on this point he is squarely opposed to both Cleveland and Harrison.

It is difficult to discuss international, unrestricted competition in trade and do it seriously, because it has no practical bearing on anything that is going on in this day and generation. That absolute free trade may become a practical issue this side of the millennium is possible but not probable. Evidently Brother Peck sympathizes with the poor, and I take it for granted that he fully believes that his scheme of unrestricted competition, if tried, would result in benefit to that class. But would it? Is it a true remedy? One cannot speak with certainty of a mere theory, but what is there in financial history leading to the conviction that free competition is a genuin remedy for poverty? In a free-for-all race ought we to assume that the poor will come out ahead instead of the trusts and monopolies, the plutocracy? If all the nations should agree to abolish customs duties, what is to hinder the newer, smaller, or weaker nations from becoming victims to the avarice of the powerful? There are sharks in the sea, tigers on the land, and the modern commercial pirate is everywhere present; all three of them take their highest delight in free competition. Protection is a primary element of life; it is self-defense. To progressiv civilization it is essential that commerce should, to some extent, be regulated by law. The tariff, however it may hav acquired its name, is a product of evolution from savagery and barbarism. In the natural order of progress tariffs will be improved and perfected; they will not be abolished. The highest type of tariff yet attained is a product of French political economy—a tariff with a large free list and protectiv reciprocity duties. To say that indirect taxation is dishonest is not sensational; we all know that direct taxation is also dishonest. To determin which of the two is the most unfair and dishonest is a fine subject for dispute, but the statesmen of all nations would probably decide in favor of direct taxation. To sum up on this head, my freethinking leads to the conclusion that free trade and fair trade are two quite different things and that absolute free trade has no substantial charm for the Liberal mind and is not a true remedy for the ills of poverty.

It is remarkable that at this late day as shrewd a people as the Americans claim to be should still be disputing about the tariff. It ought to hav been settled in twenty years after it was taken in hand by keen Yankee intellect.

Far be it from me to claim that the average American is either shrewd or wise as a business legislator; he is too much interested in campaigns of education in partisan lying and appeals to passion and greed. Thomas Paine said that all governments were a necessary evil. However that may be, just as long as national governments exist the necessity for regulating commerce by law will exist. The really remarkable thing is that any person should consider the tariff question capable of permanent settlement. If it was finally settled that would be an extremely remarkable circumstance. Whether the poor will always be with us I cannot guess, but the tariff racket, although it be not a thing of joy or beauty, is likely to abide with us forever. There is a substantial reason why I hav profound respect for "keen Yankee intellect" and it is with a feeling of genuin regret that the admission is drawn from me that even Yankee intellect cannot achieve the impossible inside of twenty years. Furthermore, that mysterious and fickle creature known as "the people" has yielded to the enormous pressure of the great Bourbon reaction and has swept the Yankee from the supreme seat of power. That last sentence opens a mine full of fresh, timely, and interesting material to the hand of every lover of human improvement, but I hav no intention on this occasion to investigate the new Pandora's box which has been opened before us, to our distress, by the tariff reform plutocracy. PRESTON DAY.

To the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER—Sir: I hav derived much pleasure many times from reading the articles of the energetic and unrestrainable John Peck. He is evidently at home on ethical and religious subjects, but it seems to me that his lectures on money and the tariff are not so logical.

About 1870, railway people found out that steel rails were far better and more durable than iron.

English mills were making steel rails, none were being made in the United States; the price in England was $60 per ton.

Congress levied a duty of $27 per ton on them. That was protection. American mills soon commenced making steel rails, and very soon competition at home reduced the price to $30 per ton and less. Neither the $27 per ton duty, nor any part of it, was ever added to the price of home-made rails.

I mention the steel rails to illustrate the fact that the tariff rate is not always added to the manufacturer's price. Many other similar cases might be adduced.

In this case the tariff actually caused a very great reduction in the cost of steel rails to railway builders, and it has the same effect in many other cases.

Mr. Peck says the tariff makes the poor pay what the rich ought to. I don't so read the McKinley bill and other late tariffs. I ask Mr. Peck to read the McKinley tariff. I mention spirits, wines, and other beverages; fine silks and velvets; fine cloths and cassimeres; laces and embroideries; fine and heavy carpets. These and many other articles are charged with heavy duties. They are bought and used mostly by the rich, and none, or very little, by the poor. I understand the words poor and rich to be comparativ terms with no exact limit. The amount which one man would regard as wealth, to another would indicate poverty. Commodore Vanderbilt once said: "A man who has $300,000 is as happy as if he was rich."

Mr. Peck says the poor men hav nothing to be protected. I reply, they hav their labor to sell, and they need and should hav that protected, and I understand it is one of the chief objects and effects of all modern tariffs to protect home labor. I am not able to see the relevancy of Mr. Peck's fables (?) of the woman at her wash-tub and the three men putting up the price of coal. They seem to me to resemble the ad captandum vulgus style of argumentation. Who ever knew or heard of troops being sent to shoot down men because they refuse to work for starvation wages? I don't believe such an event ever happened in the United States of America, and I suspect that friend Peck has got parts of two stories mixed.

I regret as much as any man living the great amount of poverty and vice and wickedness throughout the land, and would do all in my power to emancipate my fellows from the thraldom of ignorance and superstition and consequent unhappiness, if I knew how.

I hav two remedies which, if energetically applied, will, I believe, go far towards human emancipation, viz.:

1. Compulsory education.
2. Close up the saloons.

News and Notes.

Fargo is a cosmopolitan place. It is made up of people from all sections; people of enterprise and independent thought; and there are no "ruts" either of business or creed. It is a typical Western town of about twelve thousand, with a flowing, changing, progressiv population. It has been built up on the plain alongside the river, and is, I think, the largest city in the state, and in the productiv and splendid valley of the Red river. A year ago it was swept by a great fire, and a large part of its business buildings were destroyed. But new and imposing blocks are taking their places. Fargo has a solid basis of growth. It is the center of a prosperous territory. It has suffered from "booms," and spread itself with speculativ alacrity; but it has finally come to "hardpan," and its natural force is unabated, and it proposes now to "grow with the country," and avoid artificial stimulus. It is no longer dependent on Eastern capital, but home wealth and enterprise. Most of the investments here belong to the citizens, and there is local pride and development. There is no false outside pressure. The city has a life of its own. It presents a beautiful appearance these gorgeous summer days. There are vast harvest fields about, stretching away into sunny distance, while the city itself is embowered in trees, and adorned with green, shining lawns and lovely flower gardens. The residences are many of them elegant, and on every side are evidences of prosperity, culture, and successful enterprise.

While there are many churches in the place, there is a predominant Liberal element, which is more outspoken and prevailing than is usual in a city of this size, though still, as elsewhere, Freethought suffers from indifference and cowardice. But the advance element is better organized here than in most places. A Unitarian society has been built up here, whose platform is about as broad as the universe. It has very few prayers and no creed, and every variety of opinion can feel at home in its genial atmosphere. Its leaders are radical and progressiv and draw no lines of fellowship. I hav received from its members a most royal welcome, and so far as I can find out my lectures hav been acceptable, although I hav kept nothing back of thorough going Secular principles.

The Unitarians hav a pretty church here, and it was filled every evening of my five lectures. There was no falling off, and I hav not met more appreciativ listeners than in the Unitarian church.

I arrived here on Saturday, August 11th, a total stranger I might say; but it did not take long to feel perfectly at home. In fact, the moment I received the cordial greeting of Mr. and Mrs. C. W. McDorman I realized that the conditions of success were present, and that if earnestness could do anything it would be accomplished here. Mr. McDorman has taken The Truth Seeker for many years and has always been ready to aid the cause. The work has been mainly pushed heretofore by means of Liberal literature. However, Remsburg has broken the ground, and we know he does his pioneer work well. So I had the advantage of this. Though I was personally unknown, Freethought was already a recognized factor.

Rev. Wm. M. Ballou, of the Unitarian church, is one with whom it is a delight to meet. He not only granted the use of his pulpit, but took hold himself with great enthusiasm to make the lectures a success. He did all he could, not only for my platform work, but for my social enjoyment. He introduced me to a large number of Liberal friends. He is a man we might say without prejudice. He has no ministerial limitations that I can see. He is a man of the world and takes very little stock in ceremonies of any kind. He is entirely scientific and accepts facts, and though we might differ in some mental conclusions there was the best kind of fellowship. Certainly as long as he represents the Unitarian movement in this place it will hav a constantly forward look, and no "finalities" will be in the way of the search after truth.

Besides the generous welcome which I received at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. W. McDorman, I also enjoyed the hospitality of Dr. and Mrs. E. M. Darrow, who are Liberals in the fullest sense of the term. The doctor has an excellent library where books on almost every subject can be found, and poetry and philosophy mingle with science and history. The doctor believes in social advancement and hopes for the time when there shall be happy homes and leisure for all. He is one of the favorit candidates on the Populist ticket.

Frank Irons is one of the most genial comrades in our Freethought circle. He has a brilliant literary capacity and is one of the best writers of short stories in the country, and these stories hav a great deal of reform and humanity in them. Irons is not afraid to deal with burning questions in a radical and heterodox manner. Mrs. Irons is a "Presbyterian," but she enjoyed the lectures just as much as her husband.

Mr. A. E. Nugent, who has been on the roll of The Truth Seeker for many years, is at the front here and pushed the campaign vigorously and contributed materially to its success. I must thank Mr. and Mrs. Max Stern for their delightful entertainment of the Secular Pilgrim. I was pleased to meet Mr. Falen, master mechanic of the Northern Pacific railroad, a radical thinker and reformer and an expert in his profession. Rev. J. N. Parker, a retired Universalist clergyman eighty-eight years of age, and who seems to be built for a hundred, has an undying hatred for the orthodox God and fights him as he would the devil himself, and, although with differences of opinion, gave the right hand to the Freethought iconoclast. Professor Waldron, of the Agricultural College, together with most of his confrères in that institution, are scientific Liberals. I visited with him the college, located at Fargo. It is a young institution, but it has great promis. Its corps of professors are well equipped and hav the enthusiasm of youth. Professor Waldron is an original investigator in his line of work—horticulture. I am sorry to say that they hav religious services at the college every day, sing "Come to Jesus," repeat the Lord's prayer, etc. The professors are not over fond of the duty. It is hoped that common sense and justice will prevail and these remnants of the dark ages be swept from this noble scientific institution. So far as learning is concerned, it is ably conducted, and practically very few students graduate without being heterodox.

Dr. and Mrs. Vidal are among our pleasant acquaintances here; also Mr. and Mr. Winship, Colonel and Mrs. Morrow, Dr. and Mrs. McConnell, Mr. and Mrs. Baker, Mr. Ball, O. J. and Eugene de Lendrecci—who own and conduct one of the largest business establishments in the city—Mr. and Mrs. Alex. Stern—the Stern Brothers are leading merchants of the city—Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Thompson, Dr. B. F. Manning, Dr. C. L. McLaren, and J. F. Schoeninger. I could mention many names, all of good and true Liberals, friends and comrades in the forward march of the world. Space forbids me to increase the roll. To the Unitarian Society, to its minister and deacons, I must giv thanks for their splendid coöperation. Such "deacons" are worthy of respect, notwithstanding the orthodox sound.

I increased the list of truth seekers by nearly a round dozen, and I hope for more. Dr. Vidal, Terence Martin, J. L. Otley, C. B. Waldron, E. Herrman, J. Sternberg, Mrs. Cora Wirnandt, T. B. Cosley, Ira Eddy are on the list. This shows that Freethought has struck its roots pretty deep into this soil, and the "tree of Liberty" will flourish.

Morehead is over across the Red river in Minnesota. The people of Fargo go over there occasionally to take a drink, and this increases materially the prosperity of Morehead, for Fargo is a "dry" town, owing to constitutional prohibition, and of course one must go "over Jordan" for a little inundation. Morehead, however, is a fine looking place. It has some good Liberals. The Normal college is located there; and although not so large as Fargo, it is a worthy rival on the opposit bank of the Red river.

Harvests, on the whole, are pretty good in this great valley, and the outlook is not so bad as it might be. Hard times do not prevail so much as in other parts of the country. The rebuilding of Fargo has been in many respects a help to industry and progress.

In fact Fargo has been to me not so much a place of labor as of rest and inspiration along the pathway of reform. We are disappointed so many times that we get used to it, and grin and bear it. That is the way of the frontiersman. We must take good and evil fortune with equanimity. But my experience at Fargo is above the average. Its large success was so unexpected; there was such a variety, yet unity of ideas and sympathies, so much friendliness, such an atmosphere and breadth of Freethought, that it has been more than an ordinary influence for hope and courage. It has been like a bright and beautiful prospect from some extended elevation where the world appears in more vivid colors, and the mind is filled with the promise of the future, that the harvest will shine, and labor will not be fruitless.

I was pleased to again meet Rev. Mrs. Putnam, who works in the Unitarian field. We are cousins of course, for there is no doubt that our ancestors came over in the Mayflower and the Pilgrim blood is in our veins. Samuel P. Putnam.

Observations.

In the case of the United States versus J. B. Wise, now pending in Kansas, it is to be noted that the defendant has something of an advantage over the prosecuting witness, the Rev. Mr. Vennum, in the significance of his name as spoken. It is better to be wise that vennumous. The middle name of the accused, which is Beetum, may also be portentous. Scripture is silent on the subject of Vennum, but givs us to understand the foolish shall on occasions be permitted to harass the Wise. The clergyman ought further to recollect that, according to the Preacher, "the Wise and their works are in the hands of God (Eccl. ix. 1).

Talking about definitions of God, the one given in the Children's Corner by fourteen-year-old Estella Weaver should win the book, or even a library. Having read the said definition several times, I am ready to say that it answers every purpose. True, it does not define God, or even mention him. It is like the book of Esther in that respect, but I maintain that the reader will know just as much about God as if it were otherwise. Perhaps Miss Estella is poking fun at Mr. Genone. Taken as it stands, her definition is a joke "unconscious," as she would remark, "yet true."

The lecture on "Orthodoxy vs. Evolution," delivered last winter by Daniel T. Ames before the Liberal Club of New York, and before the Philosophical Society of Brooklyn, is now printed in pamphlet form. The Truth Seeker prints elsewhere an advertisment of the same. Mr. Ames's mind is perfectly clear on the subject he discusses, and he makes no reservations in favor of orthodoxy. In fact, he finds nothing in it worth saving except the Golden Rule, which it borrowed, and its social features, which belong more to human nature than to religion. The truths of evolution are apparent and demonstrable, but orthodoxy contains no vital truth and its central thoughts are misconceptions. When the last of these are exposed, and when the highest traits of mankind become common to all the race, orthodoxy will hav disappeared entirely. The majority of Bible characters, Mr. Ames says, would be ostracized to-day, while their ideas, methods, and beliefs hav been superseded by discoveries and improvements which render them worthless. Any one who wants a good tract to place in the hands of inquiring persons could confidently look for gratifying results if he chose this little brochure of Mr. Ames's.

It is a coincidence worthy of note that prosperous times, like the Golden Age, are always in the past. The free silver people hav a whole lot of statistics to prove that the country never had any show except when silver coinage was unrestricted. There are the free bankers who contend that despite all disadvantages the state bank system gave the people the best monetary service. The fiatists point with pride to the stimulus given farming interests by greenbacks, thirty years ago. The free traders can demonstrate to any reasonable person's satisfaction or confusion that tariff laws hav always been beneficent to the extent that they reduced previously existing customs duties. I believe that religious people attribute all advance to the influences of Christian civilization, and the protectionists make the grand bluff by claiming everything that is good had its origin in the McKinley law. Thus Mr. Chas. O. Hays, whose well balanced name would be pie for a sign painter or job printer, indorses a statement that "during the first two years of the McKinley law the prosperity of the United States was greater than was ever previously enjoyed by any country or any people living under the light of civilization." It is probably true that the artificial stimulus or advantage given to some branches of industry gave an appearance of prosperity to the community, but it must not be forgotten that Mr. McKinley went into bankruptcy under the workings of his own law, which law survived the prosperity it is accredited with producing. He, it seems to me, should hav known enough about his bill to steer clear of the rocks it placed in the path of general business. Such fictitious prosperity reminds me of an incident, which I will relate.

A campaign orator from Houston stumping the state of Texas met a man, who introduced himself, and stated that he had a brother living in Houston, and inquired if the orator happened to know said relativ. It chanced that he did not, but this in no wise deterred him from saying that he did, and the man inquired, "Well, how is Bill doin'?" "Doing well," said the orator, "and I shall be glad to convey to him any greeting you may be pleased to send."

"Tell Bill, then," said the man, "that his brother Jake, which the same is myself, is devilish hard up, and that if he intends to ever do anything for me, now is the time."

The men had a drink together and separated. A few hours later, they met again, and the man, who had not been abstemious meanwhile, remarked, "So you know my brother Bill over in Houston?"

"Yes," said the orator.

"Well," rejoined the stranger, "when you see him next time, tell him you run agin' a brother of his'n, and that I'm all right."

Having congratulated each other at the bar, they parted once more, but while the campaigner was on his way to the train after the rally that night, he again collided with the man who had a relativ in Houston. "Shay," said that individual, who was now in the full glory of stimulated prosperity, 'You're er feller f'm Houston; know my brer'er; w'en see 'im 'gin tell him Jake's away up; doin' fine; an' 'at 'f he wants any help ter just let me know."

The man probably did not feel so well the next day. A to-morrow always succeeds these extraordinary states of feeling, and such a to-morrow this country seems at present to hav struck.

The inclosed item has appeared in a number of papers and is credited to the Portland Oregonian:

While the Declaration of Independence was being read at Mount Vernon, Or., on the Fourth, a short, chubby fellow, with hayseed in his hair, arose hastily, and in a stage whisper to his companion declared: "Let's go, Jennie. That's old as the hills. I heard that same piece spoken in Snohomish last year; afore that I heard it spoke at the Fourth o' July doin's in Seattle."

If this story is to spin forever down the ringing grooves of change, in connection with the historical name of Snohomish, it ought to go right, because it assumed its original form at that place somewhere about the year 1890. The facts are as hereinafter set forth. On the banks of the Snohomish river, near Fiddler's Bluff, five miles above town, resides Eldridge Morse, the pioneer journalist and lawyer of the locality, keeper of the Indian legends, son of the Great Skookum-tumtum, and historian and statistician of the Puget Sound country, being familiar with every trail between Seattle and the British border. (See Bancroft's History of the Northwest.) He now raises vegetables, which he transports to the city by means of a boat, and thence to his customers in large copper boilers suspended from his shoulders by webbins. He is a great reader and a conversationalist of unlimited powers and infinit continuity. On the Fourth of July of the year mentioned he was chosen to read the Declaration of Independence. He might hav been the orator of the occasion, except that the celebration was confined to one day. Having in his intercourse with the Indians become accustomed to depend somewhat on his hands to convey the meaning of his voice, Mr. Morse never uses notes when speaking; and rather than forego this advantage by holding up a book he committed the Declaration to memory, not omitting the list of signatures. While he was reciting it the county attorney appeared among his auditors, and after listening for a few moments retired. On his way to his office the county prosecutor met Justice Griffith, of the Nevada state bar, who asked him if he had been to the speaking. Learning that he had, the justice further inquired if the exercises were interesting, and the county attorney then made the memorable reply: "Not a bit. Time all taken up with one of Eldridge Morse's long-winded speeches."

This year it was reported that the editor of an administration organ in the same county mistook the Declaration for a defense of the railroad strikers and consequently withheld his approbation of the proceedings. Such report, however, may be classed with the Oregonian's item as a fraud. The facts as I hav stated them can be maintained. Mr. Morse and myself were good friends, or klosh tillicums as they say there, and he once gave me permission to use either his merits or his failings whenever thereby I could point a moral or adorn a tale. He is all right. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Ex-Governor Charles Robinson.

By the death of Ex-Governor Charles Robinson, the Freethinkers of the United States lose one of their number who, while not an activ worker, had always the courage of his convictions and helped the Liberals of Kansas by his open association with them and by generous financial contributions. At the camp meeting at Valley Falls in 1883, at which the Kansas Liberal League was organized, Governor Robinson was one of the favorit speakers, and he had also participated in meetings in preceding years.

Here is a sketch of the life of Charles Robinson which we quote from the New York Times:

Charles Robinson, the first governor of the state of Kansas, died yesterday [August 17th], at his home near Lawrence, that state, after an illness of ten days. He was seventy-six years old.

Ex-Governor Robinson was born July 21, 1818, in Hardwick, Mass., and at the age of seventeen began working to pay his way through college at Amherst, by teaching during his vacation. He was graduated, and took a course in medicin, after which he was associated with Dr. G. G. Holland in managing a hospital at Springfield.

Soon after the discovery of gold in California he crossed the great American desert, and reached the gold fields of the Pacific coast during the contest between the squatters on the Sutter grant and the land speculators. He was the aggressiv and uncompromising champion of the squatters. During the first struggle the mayor of Sacramento was killed on the side of the speculators, and Dr. Robinson was shot through the body. He was sent by the speculators to a prison ship, and every plan was devised for getting him out of the way.

During this imprisonment Robinson was elected to the California Legislature, and his captors was forced to release him. He then made the acquaintance of Gen. John C. Fremont, and ever afterward there was the warmest personal friendship between these men.

Dr. Robinson returned to Massachusetts, and in June, 1854, he was sent to Kansas by the New England Aid Society to establish a colony at Lawrence. He selected his claim near the village, and called it Mount Oread, and that is the present location of the great State University of Kansas. It was on this mount that the border ruffians destroyed the Robinson residence in August, 1856.

In all the pioneer struggles in Kansas, Dr. Robinson was the intimate associate and co-worker of "Ossawatomie" Brown, "Jim" Lane, and the Free State agitators of those exciting times, though he was often found in direct opposition to the high-handed and retaliatory tactics of those leaders. In his later life he was a Democrat in politics. A few years ago he published a severe criticism of the conduct of the war.

At the time of the adoption of the first legal state constitution, under which Kansas was admitted to the Union, Dr. Robinson was elected governor of the state. He served two years. He held many other positions, and was a state senator when, in 1873, he abandoned politics and retired to his large estate near Lawrence. Here he accumulated great wealth, and the estate is one of the finest in the West, highly improved and finely stocked. During his entire career Mr. Robinson was the champion of the State University, and he gave a portion of his first claim for the university site.

The New York World pays this warm tribute to the deceased humanitarian:

Dr. Robinson's name is indissolubly connected with the early history of Kansas. He was one of the leaders, the most fearless, the most aggressiv, and the most persistent, of that devoted band which waged there the long and desperately bloody struggle for human liberty.

He endured bodily anguish for it; he was cast into prison; he was plundered of his property; his home was despoiled and burned; he was in peril of his life many a time. But neither his faith nor his courage was shaken. Hatred of slavery was a consuming passion with him. All his life he was a reformer; he had that exaltation of spirit and contemptuous disregard of personal consequences which make the martyr; and though he lived to see the triumph of freedom and to enjoy his reward, he remained the reformer to the end of his days.

When Grover Cleveland was serving his first term as president he appointed Governor Robinson director of the Haskell Indian Institute, at Lawrence, a position for which he was in an eminent degree qualified. We shall probably hav occasion later to giv more exact particulars of his reformatory work in various fields. He was a true man, who kept his integrity even in the turmoil and corruption of politics, and his word was a guarantee of good faith to all who knew him.

The Doctrin of the Atonement an Interpolation.

The doctrin of the atonement, of Christ's death having been a sacrifice in expiation of the sins of mankind, is the keystone of the common form of modern orthodoxy. It takes its origin from the epistles, and we believe can appeal to only three texts in the evangelists for even partial confirmation. In Matt. xx, 28, it is said, "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to giv his life a ransom for many," an expression which may countenance the doctrin, but assuredly does not contain it. Again, in Matt. xxvi, 28, we find, "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Mark (xiv, 24) and Luke (xxii, 20), however, who giv the same sentence, both omit the significant expression; while John omits, not only the expression, but the entire narrativ of the institution of the eucharist, which is said elsewhere to hav been the occasion of it. In the fourth gospel, John the Baptist is represented as saying of Jesus (i, 29), "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world," an expression which may possibly be intended to convey the doctrin, but which occurs in what we hav already shown to be the most apocryphal portion of the whole gospel ("Creed of Christendom," p. 232).

THE Freethinkers of Kansas will hold a convention in Topeka, Kan., September 6th-9th. Preparations are being made to hav it a grand success. Excellent speaking and singing will be the distinctiv features of the occasion. Many Freethinkers—Agnostics, Spiritualists, and Liberals of other shades—hav signified their intention of being present and participating in the deliberations of the convention. Kansas is having good crops this year and, notwithstanding the calamity of the great strike, its people are hopeful and look forward to better times in the not distant future. W. S. Bell is now lecturing in Kansas, helping to prepare the minds of the Liberals for the coming intellectual feast. His address is 114 East Fourth street, Topeka, Kan.

A Happy Thought.

ORO CITY, COL., August 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Here I come with money for renewal and one new subscriber—a brilliant young thinker who sees things just as they are—that is, there is no veil of illusion over his mind.

You are right. I hav always believed in taxation of all church property. If God can't pay the taxes on his church, let him turn it over to his devil, who would pay the taxes and make it a paying institution. Yours fraternally, ELMER DUTRO.

Hard Times Adjectivly Qualified.

EASTON, WASH., August 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I beg your pardon for my delay in renewing. Owing to the scarcity of money and hard times I could not send sooner. Inclosed find $6.50, to apply on my subscription for another year and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I must hav the book by all means. I was in hopes to hav got a new subscriber for your paper, the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, but these Democratic hard times just settle that for the present. Yours for freedom, PETER N. WIIS.

The Book Will be Well Placed.

HELENA, MONT., Aug. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $10, to be applied as follows: Renew my subscription, and send me one copy of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." This I want to donate to the public library of this city, hoping that it may do some good, for Helena is heavily burdened with all kinds of churches, though there are some good Liberal people here. For the balance send copies of "Church Taxation" pamphlet. Our legislature meets here this winter. Yours truly, J. V. STAFFORD.

A Good Example.

NORTONVILLE, KAN., Aug. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed 50 cents to be applied to the defense of Mr. Wise of our state. This is of course a very small help, but if every reader of the dear old TRUTH SEEKER would send in his mite a formidable sum would be the outcome.

I wish I were able to make it as many dollars, but I hav had a prolonged sickness and am just able to be up. I may help more after awhile. I thought somebody had to begin to send and so I mail what I hav to spare just now.

With best wishes for our stanch old TRUTH SEEKER,

MRS. SUSAN REICHERTER.

With Cordiality.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Aug. 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for the defense of Mr. J. B. Wise, of Kansas. I wish I could afford to send more, for I believe if this defense can be ably conducted it will greatly help the Liberal cause by opening the eyes of many to the true character of the holy Bible, so called. I hav been a constant reader of your paper for many years. I take this occasion to thank you most heartily for the able efforts you hav displayed as Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope you may for a long time serve us and the public by the work you seem so well fitted to perform.

Cordially yours, R. FRANK SMITH.

"Immense" Is the Word.

NAPLES, N. Y., Aug. 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I send you to-day $2, which you will please place to my credit.

I want to say that Heston is immense. It is doubtful whether he has an equal in his line in the country. His flying goat would send a ripple of laughter all through the celestial regions. Old Aby would laugh till he shook Lazarus out of his bosom, and the keys of St. Peter would be made to jingle. And didn't old Dan know how to fix the lions? He knew the soothing influence of the seductiv weed. To see him posing on the old he-lion with the smoke curling from his "sweet brier" would make gods and angels laugh.

The Clerical Method.

PELLA, IOWA, August 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Noting your proposition to send eight copies of the "Age of Reason" for $1, I will inclose the amount. Send them to me, and I will put them where they will do the most good.

In talking with a minister who had been a missionary in India for twenty years, I told him that I was opposed to churches, and he wanted to know my reasons. I told him on account of persecutions—wherever there were churches there was persecution. He said that the Baptists never persecuted. I told him when I read of the rack, the thumbscrew, the dry pan, and slow fire, I thought the Christians were worse than heathens. He said that I was the worst heathen he ever saw and that I ought to hav my mouth stopped. "That is the spirit of some Christians," I told him. He could not answer my questions and so wanted my mouth stopped.

The Riot Act Read.

WATERBOROUGH CENTER, ME., Aug 6, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it is my family Bible. I am the eighth in a large family, and as yet not one of us has joined any church, though we sometimes attend services for the fun of the thing. Not long ago myself and others of the boys were at a Baptist church. The deacon appeared to take offense at the way we conducted ourselvs, for he went home and wrote what we call the riot act, and the next Sunday he read it to us. It was as follows:

Thaire shall Be no gunnin on the lord's Day Nore boating on the lake, no Fishin. No Holling. Coal. No Boys Chew Tobacco in the Church ore whisper ore laugh this is to be red Three time Before it Becoms A law And if these Rules Ar Browen these Boys Shall Be turned over to the Constables And Be taken to some J. P. And Tried.

The document was read once; then we captured it and brought it home; and that was the last of the riot act.

Yours truly, M. F. COFFIN.

Inspired by Nature.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL., Aug. 12, 294.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed Uncle Sam's postal order for $6. Please renew my subscription and send the books named. Every week THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches the California wilderness like rolling thunders in the mountains, and illustrates the triumph of Freethought over unquestioning belief. The air of this beautiful state is full of Freethought. The tall elm and the sturdy oak indulge in kindly whisperings. Of course it is pleasant to get down on the yellow ocean beach and hear the low waves talk to the sands, while the music of the rustling leaves, and the sweet breathings of the gentle zephyr touch a responsiv chord deep down in human nature when its diapson is love, Freethought, liberty. Nature itself has written a book whose every leaf is full of Freethought sentiment. This book is musical, open, and truthful to those whose heartstrings are set to harmony with scientific evidence and Freethought.

I wish to walk in love and light,
With woman equal by my side;
My joy will then be truth and right,
Eternal justice be my guide.

Testimony Favorable to the Plaintiff.

NEILLSVILLE, WIS., Aug. 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As I am a regular subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, you will allow me to intrude on your good nature by giving testimony in the case now pending before the American people—"Samuel P. Putnam, et al., vs. un-American Principles." I rate Mr. Putnam with the best American speakers of the day. He has just closed a series of five lectures here with marked results. His lectures are from a scientific and common-sense point of view; he abuses no one, and the most refined can listen without offense. He keeps in sight the great American principles, "Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," as well as the elevation and improvement of the moral, social, and intellectual condition of the human race.

Mr. Putnam is a man who will be heard. His audiences increased from the first, and the last night taxed the capacity of the house (the Unitarian church), and they listened to a lecture of two hours with as much attention and interest as I hav ever witnessed. In the near future we hope to fall in line for another course of lectures. We think he is doing much good, and this world is better because he is in it. Every community where there is a handful of Liberals, or Unitarians, should take in a series of his lectures. His address for the next five or six months is 234 South Water street, Chicago, Ill., where he will be pleased to answer all communications respecting lectures. S. C. BOARDMAN.

A Colored Fisherman's Luck.

PANKAHOOCHIE, FLA., Aug. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: We are blessed with three negro churches nearby, and can often hear their joyful noise from 10 to 2 o'clock at night for weeks in sucession. The ministers are all cotton-field negroes without any education, whose sermons are nothing but holy howls, without any articulation of words. But these are continued for hours with increased fervor and gesticulation of arms and limbs and agonizing movements of body, until the audience become hpynotized, and jump to their feet and form a circle of shouting and dancing idiots.

One of these ministers entered my office a few days since, when the subject of fishing was being discussed, and remarked that he "had been fishing off aud on since constipation [emancipation], and that he had never known the fish to bite so dysentery [dilatory?] as they do this season."

When you hav time for a few days off, and want something to laugh and grow fat on, spend the time at Lake Hall with your friend, FLORIDA.

Prayer and Drouth.

ESKRIDGE, KAN., Aug 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The weather is very dry here and has been for some time. The Christians hav called special meetings and prayed for rain, while the barometer indicated clear weather. One of the Christians who seemed to think that my belief might hav been the cause of their prayers being fruitless, wanted to know what I thought about praying for rain, to which I replied: "Your question seems to indicate a doubt as to the efficacy of prayer. I do not blame the people, who are honest, no doubt; still I insist that such prayers are born of ignorance and credulity. Very few people are acquainted with the solar or planetary system and the relation that each bears to the other. This planet (like others) is governed by inexorable law. If all the ministers in the world should pray for rain we would hav some kind of weather; in other words, it makes not the slightest difference. I think the people who depend upon prayers to change the forces of nature are extremely foolish. They are always advising their God to do differently from what he does. Dry seasons, and wet seasons, visit many parts of this globe whether inhabited by man or not, and if every human being should commit suicide to-day we would hav some kind of weather to-morrow. There would be dry and wet seasons. Some Christians seem to regard the preacher as an inspired barometer and think that in some mysterious way he can control the elements by prayer. I feel sorry for such people. They believe that a drouth or a cyclone is produced by the sins of the people; that a few unbelievers are sufficient to produce a drouth, while thousands of prayers fail to produce rain. 'The rain falls alike on the just and the unjust.'"

Of course he regarded me as a very dangerous man. I hav been told that I am the cause of the drouth. I think they are mistaken, as I find the drouth is more intense in many places than here—especially in Nebraska. C. W. WILLIAMS.

No Rest for Mr. Peck.

PETERSBURGH, IND., August 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. John Peck very truly says that the tariff is a tax that the importer pays to our government for the privilege of selling foreign goods in our market, and that the amount of that tax is added to the cost of the goods, and that the consumer pays it; intending, no doubt, to convey the idea that the said consumer pays this burdensome tax needlessly, uselessly, and foolishly for having voted it upon himself; but Mr. Peck neglects to say that the consumer also pays to the importer some profit, over and above said cost and tax, and that the amount of that profit depends upon and is limited only by the state of our market, which, like all other markets, is governed by the well-known commercial law of supply and demand, and that if it were all demand and no domestic supply, we would be entirely at the mercy of these same importers, whose profits could be curtailed only by the tariff. Thus it occurs that, in the humble opinion of the undersigned, it is the importer who pays the tariff out of what would otherwise be his profits, as the goods sell at the market price, tariff or no tariff. Take, for instance, the time when there was a great demand for iron in this country and very little domestic supply; railroad iron was imported and sold at from $80 to $120 per ton; the manufacture of iron in Europe cost no more then than now, and the profits on that iron, as shown by the present market, were not less that 300 per cent to the importer. But the price of sugar came down when the tariff was taken off. Granted; but it was entirely because of the competition provided for in the McKinley bill and by the reciprocity treaties that kept up the supply. The price of tea and coffee did not come down when the tariff was taken off during Grant's administration, as the general, who was educated in the free trade school, expected that it would, and the importer coolly pocketed that much more profit. Mr. Peck says, "Those who work for self-interest and those who work for the common weal can never agree." True again. In whose interest does the importer work, spreading broadcast his free trade literature through such hirelings as James Gordon Bennett, et al., who share his ill-gotten millions for creating unrest among working people by slandering those who giv them employment, and asserting, as Mr. Peck does, that "a tariff produces nothing, and consequently there can be nothing to distribute as a general benefit to all," when he knows that the tariff has produced nearly all the revenues of this government from the time of its inception until now, and that no direct tax has ever been levied by the United States government upon the people of the states but has been returned to them? This tariff question was as well settled by the fathers of our republic as was religious freedom; they no more put free trade in the Constitution than they did a cruel Jewish God.

Where to Find the Parson.

In country town, on fairest spot
That friends and fools through fears hav bought,
And made to him a gift for naught,
You'll find the parson.

In city grand, with richer fold
To listen to the lies of old,
And chip in larger sums of gold,
Suits best the parson.

In banquet hall with richest fare,
Fooling the guests with foolish prayer,
Then feasting high in cushioned chair,
Will be the parson.

In council room or Senate hall,
For minutes five on gods to call,
Brings dollars ten—and taxed are all
To pay the parson.

In clothes so fine none can surpass,
On every train with railroad pass,
And loaded with conceits en masse,
You'll see the parson.

In summer-time he leaves his sheep,
And crosses mount or ocean deep,
To get at earthly kings a peep,
Or goes to Rome his God to seek—
Playing the parson.

With oily hair and oily speech,
Claiming sole right mankind to teach,
Of gods and devils and hell to preach—
That is the parson.

With the damsels shy and witty,
With the widow young and pretty,
When alone with only Kitty,
You'll find the parson.

Where farmer works with all his might,
Where factory hums from morn till night,
In coal-mine deep far from daylight.
You'll find no parson.

Now, friends of man, come, let us try
To raise the flag of Freethought high!
Then in the near sweet by and by
There'll be no parson.

Mr. Burk—Mr. Swan.

TOMS RIVER, N. J., August 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please favor me with space in your valuable paper to answer the letter of Mr. Thos. Burk, dated March 31st, which would hav received attention sooner but from my many months' absence from home.

Mr. Burk kindly asks me to learn, from a "spirit" source, of the death of his deceased brother, how, when, and where it occurred—which is a very reasonable request; and I should be pleased to giv him the desired information, but I am not a medium, and can only suggest that he visit some clairvoyant or other person who has the power to communicate with the spirit world; and if the deceased is present he will gladly accept the conditions through which he can converse with his brother Thomas. All pretended mediums (some of whom are frauds) are not developed sufficiently to obtain the wished-for information; besides, Mr. Burk's brother may not be with him at all times, ready to communicate. Since my letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav witnessed many wonderful manifestations which hav confirmed what I previously believed; but I will giv only my understanding of what Spiritualism is, and while I may differ in some minor points from some others, yet I agree with most well read Spiritualists. It is not necessary to prove an entity or soul-life as existing outside of and separate from matter to show that what is called spirit-life exists, for Materialists agree that life or energy comes with and is a property of matter, and that without matter there can be no life. Granting this to be true, it does not disprove the existence of what Spiritualists call spirit-life or spirit matter, and should it hereafter be shown that matter constitutes all things, it will not dispose of the fact of a life beyond the grave, but will simply show that man in his present physical condition does not know of the divisions of which matter is susceptible.

I believe that the same inherent force that sustains man in human form can pass into matter of a more subtle form, yet be the same individuality as before, as shown by those having a sense of conditions not usually possessed, such as clairvoyance, clairaudience, etc. Just how this change takes place no one is prepared to say, and had we not undisputed proof of more highly developed senses than the five taught by science, we might doubt their existence, but we find them in the lower animals of many kinds. True, man in his jealousy cries "Instinct," but is it not knowledge, and is man more than an animal? Is sense more than knowledge?

Spirits know of no heaven or hell, but as we liv so we die; and so we enter life as a spirit, not to be cursed eternally, but to do as we hav done on earth, evolute to better and happier conditions; and the better in earth life, the further advanced in spirit life. A. D. SWAN.

A Few Questions for the Gospel Twisters.

Say, if 'twas truly God's design
To keep men ignorant as swine,
  Not knowing good from evil,
Why didn't he just arm that tree
With spines as thick as bristles,
Then hedge it round upon the ground
  With cactus and bull-thistles?

Why plant that murderous tree at all,
So dangerous to the health of all,
  And to himself so galling?
And then, why giv that fierce command
He knew they could not understand,
With all its mystic meanings and
  So sure to cause their falling?

And what about the serpent wise—
Was he a god in that disguise,
  Or devil in a snake's skin,
Who dared dispute that threat of dying,
And charge his God with willful lying,
And every word he said denying—
  Was it a scheme to make sin?

Why did not God that serpent choke,
Or was it but a funny joke?
  'Twould seem so in our version.
When neither right or wrong they knew,
He wished to see what they would do,
And test his handiwork when new,
  All for his own diversion?

If God in justice judges sin,
Why did he not at once begin
  With his first pets in error;
First stand that serpent on his head,
His tail tied to a limb till dead,
For telling truth, must it be said,
  A monument of terror;
Then call his children to his knee,
And giv them both a pardon free?
  It seems so very odd like,
When right from wrong they could not tell,
How was it that they could rebel,
And was it right to giv them hell
  For trying to be God like?

The Supernaturalist.

SPRINGDALE, ARK., Aug. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The supernaturalist still livs in this age of light, a survival from a superstitious and barbaric age; a stumbling-block to mental expansion and human advancement. You approach him with new truths and questions of reform, vitally related to human well-being, and urge their necessity, only to find him tied to the supposed relief-gods of an antediluvian period. To the cry of a nation enslaved, he will reply: "It is written," "we shall suffer," "the prophets hav foretold it," "the God of Israel reigns." Such are the dreams of those who "sleep in Jesus," and whose bodies alone seem alive. To such this blessed earth is only so much dirt, a tree so much wood, birds and flowers as charmless as Pharaoh's plagues, and man himself the incarnation of all evil. And yet, how lucky to hav a God parentage for all our ignorance! To save the soul they must deny the earth, its blessings and charms, and worship a vacuity which is drawn from the bloody records of a barbarism antedating any but the crudest civilization by thousands of years. The old systems of the Nile, and of Asia and their mystical lore, fit only for an age of stone, still dominate their minds in preference to the beneficent and elevating truths of modern life. What a joyous people we should be were we natural in our thoughts and lives! How blessed as compared with the gloom under a diseased and miserable supernaturalism! Under the one, truth, the product of reason, is denounced as Infidelity and blind faith exalted as the savior of mankind. It never occurs to them that priest and mammon feed at the same crib; that lord or priest is big only in proportion as faith is strong and mentality weak; that both rest upon a stratum of blind credulity which the light of common sense would crumble into dust. Reason alone can free man and fill him with responsiv impulse to the beautiful in nature and lift from the heart the burden of gloom imposed by a faith in the gods and demons of heaven and earth. Let our search for truth be for truth's sake, and with that earnestness with which we defend our prejudices, and it will find its way to us, and will free us from masters who control for tribute our spiritual, physical, and political systems. Truth and more truth should make us glad. It can liberate the mind so that the priest can no longer truly call us his people, and we will hav no need of other than the good mastership of our own natural and healthful minds. Such will truly recognize the course and abuses of human development; that all good comes by a comprehension of and ability to conserve natural law; and that a broad and safe morality cannot depend for its source or support upon supernaturalism. Then we shall be led by sense instead of ceremony or sound, and by principle rather than by jugglery or a name. The cry of Infidel cannot much longer stifle the truth or hide it from the people. In this electric age, urgent necessity will force it upon them. It cannot be long until the masses apprehend that this Infidelity means fidelity to nature and the principles derived from a knowledge of our oneness with her rather than to the mystical and non-existent. They are learning that a lover of nature is a true lover of humanity and all beneath him; that he recognizes the kinship of all life; that, his premises being real, his knowledge and character cannot well be false; that not being bound by evident absurdities which make men slaves to little masters and tyrants to all dependent creatures, he expresses a higher and nobler manhood. He swears by no God or creed as the source or limit of truth, as do they whose faith in the mystical is startled at the appearance of rational thought so dangerous to the supreme virtue of faith alone. He denies the faith which leads fullgrown muscular men to believe that swearing is more sinful than deceit, treachery, and falsehood, or the monumental sins of a nation which robs labor of absolute right and its most essential need, and stifles its groans in a felon's cell. He rejects it as too weak for the mentality of a child born of healthy parents; as unfit to liv by, because, as the faithful truly state, "it will do to die by," as our cemeteries, full of infants, attest. Their memorials truthfully declare that "the Lord," or supernature, has called them away, although kind nature, if but dimly recognized, might hav saved them. The supernaturalist can liv in harmony with nature only by accident, for his faith points the other way and leads its victim into the clutches of every humbug which greed can inspire. He who needs the soul doctor pays tribute to all others; and none are so god-forsaken as the man or nation seeking him constantly in prayer, and so true is it that fasting follows prayer, that this part of the scriptural injunction seems a silly waste of words. C. L. PRATT.

Views from Afar.

BORDEAUX, FRANCE, July 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am obliged to you for the sample TRUTH SEEKERS and book-list duly received. Inclosed please find $2 for four months' subscription to your paper, Miss Gardener's "Facts and Fictions of Life," and Hartmann's "Creation of God." I shall want more a little later, when I can better afford them.

To an Englishman living on the Continent, especially in France or Spain, your journal has peculiar significance, for it is here that he sees in full strength that giant priestcraft (le clericalisme) to which the great Gambetta referred as the enemy of enlightened progress. Here, perhaps more than in any other country, are to be witnessed those ceremonies which for centuries hav seduced and held in bondage the souls of men. Here is seen the incense slowly rising from the golden censers swung in rhythmic motion by the hands of trained priests; here are heard those mysterious mumblings, countless chanttings and repetitions, in a tongue strange to the majority. I hav stood beneath the great dome of the majestic temple of Cordova (wrung from the Arabs who once overran Spain), and as I watched the noiseless goings to and fro of the black-robed Spanish priests, up before my mind rose a vision of the times gone by, of the long dark night of a thousand years, when Rome's hand was infinitly stronger than it is now and her powerful arm reached around all Europe. To my ears came the sound of the working of the rack, the tightening of the thumbscrew, the embrace of the iron virgin. And again I heard floating down the centuries the cries of those who perished that faith might liv; who suffered that others might be saved; who were tortured in order to redeem their souls from the grasp of a devil that a good God must hav created. Amid all this the solemn warning of the great iconoclast, Bradlaugh, whose earnest, ringing tones, like a clarion calling to battle, I hav often heard in London, recurred to my memory and I saw that the once hated Freethinker (who forced by sheer ability the final esteem and respect of Europe) knew well what he was talking about when he prophesied that in the church of Rome and the Salvation Army would be found the bitterest foes of the future march of enlightened freedom.

Rome declining! Not so fast as you think, my friend. She has still unlimited resources of men, money, and dupes. Do you want proofs? Look not then so much upon the past, but go to the grand cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris and to the Madeleine; go to St. Peter's at Rome; visit the wonderful treasures of the Escurial near Madrid; the cathedral and seminaries of Burgos; the marvelous piece of art of Arabian workmanship in Cordova; the churches and cathedrals again at Sevilla, Valencia, Malaga, with their countless hosts of worshipers, and you will see that the fable of Rome's decadence is a story told by simple Protestants to pacify and comfort each other. Nothing more. If her "right hand has lost some of it's cunning" or her power weakened, bear in mind that that weakness is still stronger than Freethought's strength and as such to be intelligently feared and fought with might and main.

True it is that the men capable of meeting in open combat all forms of religious delusion and superstition are but few. Bradlaugh has fallen heroically in the struggle. Annie Besant has deserted the ranks, deluded by the speciousness of an even more insidious cult, but others are left. In England, George Foote, Saladin, Touzeau Parris, and Charles Watts contest with force and eloquence every inch of ground, and little it is that escapes them. They each hav qualities which mutually supply and supplement what the other may lack. In Australia, Symes, the ancient Wesleyan minister, and Collins, his aide-de-camp, fight against great odds, but fight well. In America, Ingersoll, Putnam, and many others, carry on the work which brave, calumniated Paine so well and bravely inaugurated. In Germany, Büchner, Vogt, Haeckel, Lange, and many more, hav taken up in thorough spirit and with much ability and learning the principles initiated by Kant, Fichte, Hegel, Schopenhauer, and Strauss. In France and in Spain brave men are earnestly grappling with the powerful priestcraft which has so long overshadowed the lives of their toiling and light-hearted countrymen.

I fear to further encroach upon your time or space, but trust to hav the pleasure of receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER by return of post, and thereafter regularly. With best wishes for health,

Yours faithfully, PAUL FERDINANDO.

Obituary.—Mary Hatch.

Mrs. Mary Hatch, wife of H. M. Hatch, died at her home in Norwalk, Los Angeles county, Cal., Friday, July 13, 1894, aged 64 years. The funeral took place from the family residence on the Sunday following, the exercises being wholly secular. No clergyman was present. Friends and acquaintances opened the simple services with the singing of Hymn No. 203 from the "Cosmian Hymn-book," the "Sweet Here and Now," and a neighbor read Form No. 1 of funeral services in the "Truth Seeker Collection." At the grave the choir sang the hymn "Sleeping, Sweetly Sleeping," and these words were said:

FRIENDS: We drop the tear of sympathy on the grave now about to close over a once loved form. May the earth rest lightly upon her. May the flowers bloom above her head, and may the winds sigh softly as they herald the coming night. Peace and respect be with her memory. Farewell, a long farewell!

Mrs. Hatch was a nativ of New Hampshire, and leaves a husband 73 years of age to mourn her loss. Although in accordance with her wish, the absence of religious ceremonies at the funeral has led religious meddlers to charge Mr. Hatch with lack of respect for the memory of his wife. Reference to the hymns sung and services read will show that nothing could hav been more appropriate as the last rites of one who lived for this world and borrowed no trouble about another.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Motherhood.

My neighbor's house is not so high
Nor half so nice as mine;
I often see the blind ajar,
And tho' the curtain's fine,
'Tis only muslin, and the steps
Are not of stone at all,
And yet I long for her small home
To giv mine all in all.

Her lawn is never left to grow—
The children tread it down,
And when the father comes at night,
I hear them clatter down
The gravel walk—and such a noise
Comes to my listening ears
As my sad heart's been waiting for
So many silent years.

Sometimes I peep to see them
Seize his coat and hands and knees,
All three eager to be first,
And hear her call, "Don't tease
Papa!" The baby springs,
And then the low brown door.
Shuts in their happiness—and I
Sit wishing as before,

That my neighbor's little cottage,
And the jewels of her crown,
Had been my own. My mansion
With its front of freestone brown,
Its damask, and its Honiton,
Its lawn so green and bright,
How gladly I would giv them all,
For her motherhood, to-night.

The Inquirendo Club.

IV.

It had rained hard all day Saturday until two o'clock, when a sudden burst of sunlight announced the welcome fact that a general clearing up of the cloudy skies might be expected. The children gave a joyous shout upon the discovery, and hailed with enthusiasm Arthur's suggestion, "Let's hold our meeting upon the verandah."

"Yes," agreed Florence, "that will be nice; the grass would be preferable, however, if it were not so wet."

She went to Aunt Margaret in the library, to acquaint her with the decision, and promptly at 2:30 the entire party met upon the vine-covered porch.

"I hav a query right at hand," declared Arthur, after preliminaries. "What is Armenian literature?"

"Armenian literature," mused Florence. "Dodo, hand me my Cyclopedia. I know," she continued, "that it is the literature of a tribe of Armenians of the country of Armenia, situated geographically on the southern slope of the Caucasus; and that they were the oldest civilized people. But let us hear the account of their literature.

"Previous to the introduction of Christianity by Gregory (A.D. 300)," she read, "the Armenians had adhered to the Assyrian or Medo-Persian system of culture; but, excepting a few old songs and ballads, no remains of that early period exist. After their conversion to Christianity, the Greek language and its literature soon became favorit objects of study, and many Greek authors were translated into Armenian.

"The Armenian language has an alphabet of its own, consisting of thirty-six letters, introduced by Miesrob in 406. The most flourishing period of Armenian literature extends from the fourth to the fourteenth century, · · · when it began to decline, and few remarkable works were afterward produced, · · · but they can be found in Amsterdam, Limburg, Leghorn, Venice, Astrakan, Moscow, Constantinople, Smyrna, Ispahan, Madras, or Calcutta.

"The Armenian belongs to the Indo-Germanic group of languages, but has many peculiarities of structure. It is harsh and disagreeable to the ear. The old Armenian, the language of literature, is no longer a living tongue; while the new Armenian, split up into four dialects, contains many Turkish words and grammatical constructions."

Florence laid down the book and looked questioningly at Arthur.

"Thanks," he said, briefly.

"Who were the little princes smothered in the White Tower during King Richard's reign?" asked Ralph, aged 14, who had a great liking for historical events, especially of the sensational kind.

"That was in our reading lesson last week," said Lillie. "They were the nephews of King Richard, who caused them to be smothered, because of a political insurrection arising in favor of the eldest boy, Edward V., who was then thirteen years old. When their uncle became protector of the kingdom, the younger boy, Duke of York, and Edward V. fell into his hands, and that was the last heard of them. There is no doubt of the hapless children's fate. For in a tract of James I., it is recorded that 'the above turret our elders termed the Bloody Tower, for the bloodshed, as they say, of those infant princes of Edward IV., of whom Richard III., of cursed memory (I shudder to recall it), savagely killed two together at one time.'"

Shakspere had him die a horrible death. All the people he had murdered came to his bedside, prophesying terrible things. It was he who said:

"Every man's conscience is a thousand swords," by which we may infer that the "bloody and devouring chief felt some severe thrusts."

From the "query-box" Florence selected a pretty note from Ernestine, with the quotation from Tennyson:

For Arthur on the Whitsuntide before
Held court at old Caerleon upon Usk.

"Where are the above places? And in what century did King Arthur liv?"

Aunt Margaret answered: "King Arthur reigned over a tribe of Ancient Britons, supposed to hav lived in the sixth century. He is usually represented as a Christian prince who struggled bravely to maintain the liberty and faith of his country against the pagan Saxons, but there is no evidence that he really did. Of course, having lived so long ago, his history is considerably shady. Some doubt is current whether he ever existed at all. There is no mention whatever of King Arthur by the Venerable Bede, the oldest of all historians, or by the annalists of the 'Saxon chronicle,' and the explanation given by Mr. Skene, a writer in a later age, is not generally accepted. But poets and romancists lov to dream of the noble king, who, as Tennyson said:

Not making his high place the lawless perch
Of winged ambition, nor a vantage-ground
For pleasure; but through all this tract of years
Wearing the white flower of a blameless life,

"centered his brave knights about the Round Table, who, when occasion demanded, were dispatched upon chivalric errands, such as rescuing women; protecting fair maidens from danger; chastising oppressors; liberating the enchanted; enchaining giants and malicious dwarfs, and performing knightly missions. These twelve knights of King Arthur's retinue were the bravest of the brave; conspicuous among whom was the knightly Sir Lancelot, whose beauty and courtly bearing were constantly getting him into trouble. He loved the beautiful Queen Guinevere, and she reciprocated the affection, but other beautiful maidens shared the same preference. For him did poor, hapless Elaine destroy herself, and he it was who unwittingly brought the fateful curse upon 'the Lady of Shalott.' Of course, these are mere legends, but they help to imprint historical facts upon the mind, and are a beautiful reminder of the famous metrical romances of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Old Caerleon upon the Usk, in Wales, was the king's habitual residence, and at Whitsuntide (white-Sunday-tide), the English name for the season of Pentecost—so called because of the white garments worn by the religionists—the lords and ladies gathered for their famous 'hunt.' Popular interest in these ancient tales was rapidly declining, until revived again by Tennyson's 'Idyls of the King.'"

Aunt Margaret ceased speaking just as a well occupied carriage came slowly up the avenue. Master Ralph, recognizing his friends, gave a tremendous war-whoop by the way of a welcome, and overturning a chair in his hurry to meet them, unceremoniously adjourned the meeting.

Ideas of God.

From CLARA M. FRY, aged 16, Bentonville, Ark.

The good that one possesses, the consciousness that tells one to do right, this I call God. When every one works for the good of humanity and does all that his better self knows how to do, then this world will be a heaven below; therefore, God (the better self) cannot do greater things than the power of one human being. To sum it up in a few words—All nature is God.

From BESSIE SHAFFER, Philadelphia, Pa.

GOD.—A flimsy, clumsy nondescript; a specter; a scarecrow; an imaginary spirit of vile and cruel passion, said by primitiv man to be the author of all natural phenomena; a craze; a myth conceived at some remote date, before man had entirely divested himself of the characteristics of the orang-outang; a phantasm; a sprite; a bugaboo; an object of devotion of the faithful; a hocus-pocus machine now in common use among priests, preachers, and politicians.

From MARY L. LIVENGOOD.

What should God represent to the future Freethinker? I say, do not let him represent anything, neither to the present nor future Freethinker. If we must hav him represent something, let him be the supposed Supreme Ruler, who is worshiped by persons who hav not yet become great thinkers. Freethinkers of this day hav higher thoughts than to hav God represented as a being ruling at the present time. However it is, I never could understand either God or his book, but will try to investigate and giv a better opinion of him at some future time.

From ESTELLA WEAVER, aged 14, Petersburg, Ind.

The celestial or planetary influences act instantaneously, but owing to the matter affected, the results are cumulativ. Thus nervous congeneries act in man. Most of the livily activity of worlds, suns, plants, and animals are unconscious, though all result from the inseparable property of matter—life. The personality of animals, planets, or solar systems involves the constituents, and becomes an exponent of all, or a representation of the universe. Freethinkers might consider the universe—its worlds of teeming life, their creatures of teeming microbes—one inseparable organism, unconscious, yet true.

PIERSON, IA., June 23, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: May I suggest to the Children of the Corner that when they compete for the prize offered so kindly by Hudor Genone, they consult Webster's dictionary and be careful not to violate the standard of "good usage" in their definitions. Mr. Genone would not offer the children a bribe to "murder the king's English."

After the prize has been fairly won, and cheerfully bestowed, as it undoubtedly will be, then let the children of the Corner require of Mr. Genone a definition of "God," which shall satisfy his own conscience, without violation of standard English, and with no "prejudice for his own views."

Let the children and the philosopher frolic together. It will do them both good and brighten "the Corner."

The single-minded directness of the "Cornerites" will be a vivid contrast to the double-back-action surprises that everywhere lie in ambush within the sentences of Mr. Genone. S. F. BENSON.

From WM. BECKLER, aged 18, Escondido, Cal.

God is an imaginary being born of ignorance, created by it in order to account for the unknown causes of phenomena. A god, like the cause it stands for, is unknown; but perhaps, unlike the cause, it is also unknowable. This for the reason that just so soon as the cause is made clear to our comprehension, becomes understood, a fact is demonstrated that admits of no theoretical substitute or proxy. Hence the god, being nothing—never having been, in fact—ceases to be one even in imagination. A nothing never can be known. It is like the x in algebra—of no account when once we hav solved the equation. Of course that "indeterminate analysis," in which the equation never can be marked out to a dead-sure solution, yet remains; but what matters that? Let it remain, so long as we can't help ourselvs; so long as we can't solve it, let it go, and the x with it, and let us work on that we can get a solution of. My idea is that until we reach the solution of a solvable equation the x may be useful, but after that is reached we had better drop it, as it is of no further use to us.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to liv. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her 'curse,' of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

IN the administration of a state, neither a woman as a woman, nor a man as a man, has any special functions, but the gifts are equally diffused in both sexes.—Plato.

THE dogmatism of our creed-religions is the assertion of authority from without. Nature says to every man and woman, Look for my teaching and proof from within yourselvs, for you will find it by the material road; and every man, woman, and child can find it out only by this road, which they must walk themselvs—R. J. Drummond, in Secular Thought.

THE present social state is transitional, as past social states hav been transitional. There will, I hope and believe, come a future social state differing as much from the present as the present differs from the past with its mailed barons and defenseless serfs. . . . My opposition to Socialism results from the belief that it would stop the progress to such a higher state and bring back a lower state. Nothing but the slow modification of human nature by the disciplin of social life can produce permanently advantageous changes.—Herbert Spencer.

THERE is everywhere a lack of faith in human nature. People talk of brotherhood and yet spend half their lives studying the ways and means of ostracism and caste. They profess an abstract solidarity, and yet button their coats at the first salutation of poverty or sin. Democracy is preserved in liberty. The church and the state, all formal societies, tend to destroy all individuality. We are forced by them into a mould. To be free we must hold them in perpetual servitude. I would chain and whip an institution to my purpose without remorse as long as it was useful, and when it had forfeited all mobility I would bleed and bury it kindly, but without regret.—Horace L. Traubel.

THERE is clericalism, the enemy of the human race! Oppose it as the fiend who has covered the world with the darkness of ignorance, and illumed that darkness only by lurid and fitful glares from the fires of martyrdom. Strike the monster which has battened rich upon your poverty, which has reared its temples by robbery, shaped their oriels out of agony, and laid their foundations in blood. Down with the ogre that lived through the centuries upon the burlesquing of God and the stultification of man. Death to the demon which has sent you to a printed book for your religion, instead of sending you to the daisy and the stream and the mystic sympathies between them and your soul, and the infinit. No indifference! Strike as you love the holy! Strike as you hate the infamous!—Saladin.

ACCORDING to holy writ, God made Adam out of the dust of the ground and then breathed into his nostrils the breath of life. Now, just imagin the eternal creator of the universe blowing into the nostrils of a clay man in the hope of making it liv. Of course the origin of this old myth is obvious enough. Our savage ancestors knew nothing of biology or physiology, and they were under the impression that the breath was the cause of life They observed that while men lived they breathed, and that after death they breathed no longer, and so they jumped to the foolish conclusion that the breath was the life. The word spirit is derived from breath—a most significant fact. In fact, it may be said that men and women to-day believe that they hav souls or spirits capable of living forever, simply because their forefathers did not understand the nature of breathing—did not know that it was the process by which fresh oxygen is taken in and impure oxygen given out in order that chemical combustion, which is the condition of life, may be carried on. I remember, when a boy, trying to resuscitate dead flies by industriously breathing upon them. I may say that I was just as successful with the flies as God would hav been with a clay man—had he been foolish enough to make the attempt. The man who wrote this story may hav been inspired, but he was never at school.—Wallace Nelson.

III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism. Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject with out mu h thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us', object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for its bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN? By John E. Remsburg. The Truth Seeker Company, New York. 50 cents.

There has been a good deal of controversy from time to time through the press of the country over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious opinions. Not long since this discussion was renewed on account of the claim made by a popular clergyman that the martyr president was a Christian. Among those who combated this statement were Colonel Ingersoll and John E. Remsburg, of Kansas. The latter has been engaged in collecting the testimony, pro and con, as to Mr. Lincoln's religious opinions for over fifteen years. He spent a good deal of time in hunting up the evidence and running down stories, and the result is that he probably knows more about the facts in the case than any other man living. The result of this laborious research is contained in a handsome volume of about 350 pages recently issued by the Truth Seeker Publishing Company, New York, entitled, "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" Everyone who has a personal acquaintance with Mr. Remsburg knows him to be a very conscientious man, and that he would tell the truth though the heavens fell. This is illustrated in this volume, for he has here given every scrap of evidence that has ever been produced in defense of the claim that Mr. Lincoln was a Christian or a believer in the doctrins of Christianity. He then givs the evidence in rebuttal, and among these unimpeachable witnesses are Lincoln's wife; his old law partner and very particular friend up to the time of his death, Hon. Wm. H. Herndon; his friend and adviser while in Washington, Col. James H. Mathey; his private secretary, Col. John G. Nicolay, and his life-long friend and executor after death, Judge David Davis. Such unequivocal testimony, one would think, is sufficient, but in addition there is cited the testimony of a hundred others—Mr. Lincoln's relativs, near neighbors while a resident of Springfield, and prominent men in Washington, including members of his cabinet, and others in different sections of the country. The book closes with evidence from the tongue and pen of Lincoln himself. To our mind Mr. Remsburg has presented an array of testimony to show that Mr. Lincoln was an unbeliever in the inspiration of the scriptures and the fundamental doctrins of the Christian religion that is irresistible. But whichever side one may choose to take in this controversy, he cannot afford to be without this book, as nowhere else can the evidence presented, pro and con, be obtained. It virtually exhausts the subject and upon its testimony the case must be decided, if at all. The price of the volume in paper is 50 cents; handsomely bound in cloth, $1.—Gazetteer, Denison, Tex.

"I LIKE Sunday-school better than church, mamma," said little Emma last Sunday. "Why so, my dear?" "Because there isn't so much of it, mamma."

A NEW ROCHELLE engagement has been broken off in consequence of religious differences. Her small brother put a tack in his chair, and she didn't like his creed.—Binghamton Republican.

THE Rev. Mr. Harpe (solemnly): "And the wicked shall be cast into the lake of torment where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." Alkali Ike (appreciativly): "That must be hell."—Truth.

MUDGE: "Went to church yesterday, just for a change." Yabsley: "So? What denomination?" Mudge: "The minister, as near as I could figure him out, was a platitudinarian."—Indianapolis Journal.

MRS. JONES: "Wasn't that a powerful address of Brother Smith's at the experience meeting?" Deacon Jones: "Oh, Smith is a good man, but he's a little conceited. To hear him talk, you would think there never was a hardened sinner in the world except him!"—Puck.

THE Dear Pastor: "I hope you never go fishing on Sunday, my dear child?" Young Hopeful: "Oh, no, sir." The Dear Pastor: "That's right, my child. And now tell me why you do not." Young Hopeful: "Because papa says he doesn't want to be bothered with me."—New York Truth.

FLOSSIE: "I'm afraid to go to sleep all alone in the dark." Mamma: "You go right to bed like a good little girl, and remember that God's little angels are with you." Flossie (ten minutes later): "I can't go to sleep, mamma. I guess one of God's little angels is biting me."—The King's Jester.

A NEGRO preacher in the South, who secured the eloquent Bishop Simpson to preach to his colored congregation, thus grandiloquently introduced him: "Breddern, you are to hab de privilege dis mornin' of hearin' de great Bishop Simpson, from de Noff, a man whose repootation is all ober dis land like a soundin' brass or like a tinklin' cymbal."

"I SHALL never forget," said one pillar of the church, "what an admirable Sunday-school superintendent we had in the former cashier of the Building Association." "Yes," replied another, "he was an able young man, and so willing!" "So long in his speeches." "And so short in his accounts."—Puck.

HERE is an announcement from a Brooklyn paper under the heading of Church News: "The 'Rev.' Dr. Crowder, of Rockville Center Methodist Episcopal church, will exchange pulpits with the Rev. Mr. Hudson, of the Baptist church. In the evening Dr. Crowder will occupy his own pulpit, his subject being, 'Behold, I hav played the fool.'"

THE pastor was calling at the house of Brother Billings, and the small boy was entertaining him until the parents came down. "Do you ever go fishin'?" inquired the youngster, who had inherited his father's fondness for the sport. "I am a fisher of men," responded the good man. "Do you carry your bait in a jug, like papa does?" was the next question, and just at that moment Brother Billings appeared with a seraphic smile of innocence lighting up his genial countenance.

THE Hyogo News, Kobe, Japan, gives the following peculiar advertisement: "When my daughter was sick I prayed the Kompira of Sanuki providence for her recovery, pledging to let her pay a thanksgiving visit to the temple by creeping on her hands and feet all the way through, in imitation of cattle, if she recovered. The prayer was heard, and she recovered. But, after all, it is impossible for a tender girl to creep several hundreds of miles to Sanuki. I should, therefore, like to find a substitute for her, and if any one offering himself or herself be found suitable for the task, I will giv such a person £200." Probably Jesus would do, as he is the Christian's substitute-bearer for sins.

REV. DR. RAINSFORD, of St. George's Episcopal church, New York, is an enthusiastic sportsman, and would walk ten miles any day to find a good hunting-ground. On the subject he is eloquent. The doctor is one of the finest wing shots in the country.—Philadelphia Record. This is how he obeys the injunction of his Divine Master and preaches the gospel to every creature. The gospel reaches the poor birds in the shape of a leaden missil of death!—Ex. This sounds a little hard on the reverend sport, but we are afraid the Ex. is looking at him from the right point of view. Those who preach the gospel of mercy for a profession are a trifle inconsistent when they spend too much time in projecting shot into peaceable animals just for the fun of it.—Life.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. The number of settlers greatly outnumbered the claims, and terrible suffering has been endured.

B. H. CLOVER, who represented the Populists of the Third district of Kansas in the Fifty-second Congress, has returned to the Republicans. There is in that state a discontented wing of the Populist party, led by Cyrus Corning, W. F. Rightmire, Noah Allen, and other conspicuous reformers, which threatens to put an independent ticket in the field. The defection grows out of dissatisfaction with the Lewelling administration and the alleged failure of the "regular" organization to stand squarely on the Omaha platform.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, of Massachusetts, eldest son of the great diplomatist, Charles Francis Adams, great grandson of one president and grandson of another, died on August 14th. He had three brothers—Charles Francis, Henry, and Brooks—two of whom are authors of works of great value to the student and propagandist of Freethought. Mr. Adams leaves three sons, George, Charles Francis, and young "Jack."

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

SICKENING TALK ON THE GALLOWS.

From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., July 20th.—Dan Washington, Porter Davis, and Charley Ezell, negro murderers, expiated their crimes on the gallows in the jail yard here to-day. Their crimes were atrocious, but they died in the ecstasy of religious enthusiasm. On the gallows platform each made a brief statement, but none of them confessed.

Washington said: "Brethren, in fifteen minutes I'll be in Paradise with a long white robe on and golden slippers a walking de golden streets. When you all comes, I'll meet you at de gate and carry you to de judgment seat."

Porter Davis said: "I don't want to take up my time speaking. I am anxious to go to heaven. In a few minutes my soul will be there. You all mind the gospel and meet me there."

Charles Ezell, the wife murderer, said: "I know I am saved. I am going to sit down by Jesus. I am a true born son of Jesus, and am going home. All of you, white and black, I don't care how big you is, I am better than you, because in a little while I will take the sacrament in the city called Paradise. I see the pearly gates standing open for me."

The black caps were drawn, the preacher offered a short prayer, and the trap was sprung.

The Charity Problem.

The Committee on Charities of the New York Constitutional Convention having agreed to report against any amendment to the Constitution forbidding appropriations to sectarian institutions to pay for the care and education of dependents put into their charge, Chairman Lauterbach of that committee givs to the public some of the reasons for the conclusion to which he and his associates hav come. He says that the Committee will report five new sections, "creating a Constitutional State Board of Charities, a State Board of Lunacy, and a State Board of Prisons."

"The Board of Charities shall hav additional powers, which will serve to check abuses in public or private charitable institutions, and shall hav full charge of all affairs appertaining to such institutions, even to checking legislativ power.

"The powers of the State Board of Lunacy are extended beyond those of the present board, but a separation of its functions from those of the State Board of Charities is clearly defined.

"The State Board of Prisons has no existing counterpart, and is intended to provide supervision and inspection not only of the state prisons, bnt of the county jails and penitentiaries."

As regards the proposed amendments prohibiting appropriations for charitable institutions under denominational control, Mr. Lauterbach says:

"Unanimity exists in believing that it would be unwise to prevent the state from aiding and supporting its dependent poor through any appropriate agency or from entering into contractual relations in that behalf with private institutions, under whatever control they may be. The proposed amendment which, if adopted (together with that suggested by the Committee on Education, which prohibits the appropriation of any moneys by the state to any parochial, denominational, or sectarian school whatever), without affecting charitable institutions where education is an element in the care of its inmates, will secure in its fullest sense a separation of church and state in all matters political and educational, without, however, preventing the state from securing the services of the magnificent charitable organizations of all denominations which hav done so much to lessen the burden of the state and to secure the economy and perfection which hav characterized the eleemosynary work, so enormous in its extent, which it has devolved upon this community to perform."

Of course the report is the result of a compromise between those who wish to discontinue all appropriations of money to the kind of institutions specified and those who desire that the present loose management of affairs shall not be disturbed. It will be one of the duties—the chief duty, apparently—of the new board of charities to "supervise, visit, and investigate" all eleemosynary, charitable, and reformatory institutions, "whether state, county, municipal, incorporated or private"—except insane asylums and penal institutions—"if they receive any public aid or are exempt from any public burden or tax." No funds can be granted to any institution not already authorized to receive them except on the authority of this board and only for the support of persons committed to it by due process of law or under the rules of the Board of Charities. The Board has power to revoke the authority of any institution now existing or which may be established to receive public funds. These provisions would seem to indicate that, if this proposed amendment is adopted, no institution can thereafter receive a lump sum but will be paid a specified amount per head for such wards of the state as are actually under its care.

It will be seen that Chairman Lauterbach expresses the opinion that this amendment, together with that proposed by the Committee on Education, which forbids state aid to schools under denominational control, will—"without affecting charitable institutions where education is an element in the care of their inmates"—secure the most complete separation of church and state "in all matters political and educational." But that saving clause which refers to the educatiou incidentally given in charitable institutions is pregnant with meaning. How can there be the "fullest" separation of the ecclesiastical and the civil when millions of dollars are each year given to institutions wherein religious instruction is a regular part of the "care" bestowed upon the inmates? That such religious instruction is given in these institutions we all know, and Mr. Lauterbach admits it in this paragraph:

"The committee is unanimously of the opinion that the public has received adequate return for all moneys paid to private charitable institutions; that the expenditures made hav been in most instances far less than if the institutions had been conducted by the public; that the religious training which is insured for the young is of incalculable benefit; that the care of those in private institutions is better than that received in those under control of public local officers; that the public moneys expended under the prevailing methods are supplemented by the expenditure of enormous sums from private sources; that, to a large extent, the buildings and accessories of these organizations hav been supplied by private cost, and that the method upon the whole is certainly the most economical that can be devised, and will be still more economical when some comparativly trifling abuses, such as the too long retention of inmates or laxity in their admission, shall hav been remedied."

We confess ourselvs unable to see any difference in principle between voting money for the support of sectarian schools and voting it for the support of sectarian charitable institutions, although we are free to admit that there are many and great practical difficulties in the way of the just settlement of the charity problem. It is perfectly clear that no part of the tax fund should be used to giv "religious training" to the state's dependents. From our point of view, the religious instruction which these waifs receive is far from being of "incalculable value" to themselvs or to others, but they do need physical support, scientific education, and ethical and industrial training. What is to be done? It is alike unjust and dangerous to permit the churches to fatten and grow powerful at the expense of the taxpayers. To quote further from Mr. Lauterbach:

"Probably the noblest sectarian charities in the world are the hospitals in the city of New York. They are supported entirely by private sectarian contributions; but they extend their benefits without regard to race or creed. The occasion might arise at any moment calling for their use by the city for public purposes, but were the prohibiting amendments adopted, such arrangements would become impossible, and the city would be deprived of what might be an indispensable facility in its charitable work.

"It is clear that private institutions which expended during the fiscal year ending Sept. 30, 1893, nearly $13,000,000, of which probably $9,000,000 was derived from public sources, should be subject to the most thorough investigation, supervision, and control by properly organized public bodies. In addition to this, the expenditures upon state, county, and city institutions makes an aggregate of at least $20,000,000 for charity in the state of New York, irrespectiv of large private benefactions, of which no public record is made.

"The field covered by this vast expenditure is divided into three parts, correction, lunacy, and charity, and affected during 1893 a daily average of 80,543 individuals besides the inmates of prisons, penitentiaries, and jails, in which there was a daily average of some ten thousand persons. It is important to note that the average number of beneficiaries grew from 47,000 in 1880 to 80,000 in 1893, and the expenditure from $8,000,000 to $20,000,000."

It is true that many of the hospitals are under sectarian control, but the funds for their support come from all classes of people, religious, non-religious, and anti-religious. However, this latter fact does not seriously weaken Mr. Lauterbach's objection that the amendments proposed and rejected by the Committee would, if adopted, prevent the city or state from reimbursing these hospitals should either in an emergency, such as siege, riot, or pestilence, seize them for public use. This is one of the practical difficulties in the way of the adoption of such sweeping amendments to the Constitution, and one which all thinking, fair-minded men and women will giv careful, unprejudiced consideration, and dispose of according to the impression which the facts make upon his mind after they hav been measured by his standard of justice.

"The State Board of Charities would hav supervision over seven reformatories, eight institutions for the deaf, two for the blind, one for epileptics, three for idiots, one for Indian children, one for soldiers and sailors, fifty-eight county poorhouses, two hundred and forty-one orphan asylums and homes for the friendless, one hundred and twelve hospitals and forty-five dispensaries, with a population of 62,164."

Three courses of action are open: The first is to continue the present system of voting state aid to the various institutions, sectarian or otherwise, which care for the so-called wards of the state. The second is for the state to gradually assume the direct control and training of all these dependents, while the third is to constantly lessen the sums voted by the state to private institutions to the end that voluntary charity shall do all that state-aided charity does at the present time.

Comstock after Big Game.

Last year Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage, the renowned woman suffragist, had brought out by Charles H. Kerr & Co. a work of five hundred and fifty-four pages, entitled, "Woman, Church, and State: A Historical Account of the Status of Women Through the Christian Ages, with Reminiscences of the Matriarchate." It met with a cordial reception, for its author's name was a passport to favor, the subject was a fascinating one, and the book contained a wealth of information hitherto familiar to but to few people, comparativly. Of course it is not entirely free from errors, the most serious of which probably is the apparent credit given to ex-priest Chiniquy's story for the marines about an alleged Catholic plot to assassinate President Lincoln, and one of the minor annoying mistakes is the classification of the Unitarian Christian Register of Boston as an Episcopalian paper. But the book is, upon the whole, an admirable volume and one that can be read with profit by old and young. That Anthony Comstock should pronounce it unfit for perusal by children is astonishing, accustomed though we are to his obscene antics.

Mrs. Gage lives at Fayetteville, Onondaga County, New York. The school board of that town has refused "Woman, Church, and State" a place in the school library, on the ground that it is unfit to be read by children, and in support of its position it givs out a letter from Anthony Comstock, written to one of its members. This is the letter:

"NEW YORK SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESION OF VICE,
"Room 85 the Times Building.
"NEW YORK, Feb. 26, 1894.

"MR. T. W. SHEEDY, Fayetteville, N. Y.: Yours of 24th inst. by express, inclosing a book entitled 'Woman, Church and State,' by Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage, is just received. In reference to whether this is a proper book to put in a school library for children to read, I unhesitatingly say, No, it is not a proper book for children to read. What may be proper for a mature person is a very different thing when placed in the homes of boys and girls. The incidents of victims of lust told in this book are such that if I found a person putting that book indiscriminately before the children I would institute a criminal proceeding against them for doing it.

"This is not on the theory that the intent of the writer is impure, because that is a question which has nothing to do with the dissemination of matter 'which tends to inflame the imagination and corrupt the minds and morals of the young, or persons open to such immoral influences into whose hands a publication of this sort may come.' The details given where young girls hav been ruined certainly cannot be helpful to any child, but would suggest thought of a most impure and dangerous character. The policy of the law is that persons who are liable to be affected by such things as these shall not be brought under their baneful influence. The book is undoubtedly designed by the author to work a reform against certain evils which undoubtedly exist, but that does not justify the putting of such a book as that in the library of a school, where boys and girls shall hav free access to it unbeknown to parents, and make the horrible details of that book a subject for conversation among themselvs. I return the book by express as requested.

"Very truly yours, ANTHONY COMSTOCK, Sec."

Had the school board and Comstock said that sectarian works ought not to be admitted to a public school library, and had they, in deference to this just principle, shut out with "Woman, Church, and State," the Bible and all later Christian and other religious works, they would hav been in an impregnable position, and no Freethinker would hav thought of assailing them there. But when they debar Mrs. Gage's noble volume, yet retain large numbers of religious and quasi-religious books, they reveal themselvs in their true characters, and place themselvs in a wholly indefensible attitude. This is not the worst of the matter, however; not daring to do justice, realizing that to object to the admission of "Woman, Church, and State," to the school library on the ground that its admission would be a violation of the principle of separation of church and state, would expose the fact that they are themselvs the defiant, persistent, wholesale violators of that very principle, they hav resorted to the despicable, cowardly subterfuge of charging Mrs. Gage's production with being indecent in effect, if not in intention. This course of procedure is reprehensible in every way; it is mean, it is sneaking, it is libelous. Mrs. Gage should hav no difficulty in making Comstock pay salutary damages for this dastardly trick. Or, if he is as financially impecunious as he is morally poverty-stricken—which is extremely doubtful, however—she should be able to recover from the members of the Fayetteville school board, who published Comstock's criminal libel. It is time for some one to pay handsomely for the usurped privilege of defaming the reputations and works of honest men and women. It is time for an example to be made of some of these prurient-minded creatures who would deserve only the pity of sane and healthy people if they would cease bedaubing with their own corruption the brain-fruits of the most earnest and oftentimes clearest-seeing humanitarians in the world. Comstock's insinuations regarding "Woman, Church, and State" should be resented in a more tangible way than through press denunciations. He cares nothing for such so long as his financial backers are not thereby weaned from his support. A few libel suits, vigorously prosecuted, would teach him at least a little prudence. He is not amenable to reason; epithets, no matter how fitly applied, glance harmlessly from his armor of ignorant self-conceit; he glories in his work and is utterly unable to discriminate between obscenity and physiological instruction. This is why none of his animadversions upon Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage's book in the least affect those who understand the censor's hopeless limitations. He knows even less concerning the proper training of youth than the unlettered plowboy does about the science of astronomy. And yet he arrogates to himself the title of protector of virtue, and presumes to say what the millions of children in America shall read. Referring to this very subject of sex and asking who they are who declaim against physiological knowledge and beauty, Grant Allen answers:

"The lean and haggard ascetics of the Thebaid; the vile St. Antonies, pursued by swinish dreams and unclean images; the monks and nuns of the Middle Ages; the like-minded fanatics of the nineteenth century. The idea of the essential impurity and danger of sex began with the savage."

In reading Comstock's letter one is most forcibly reminded of the fact that the Christian idea is that ignorance is the only efficient safeguard of innocence. The offense of Eve was that she partook of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, thus becoming able to distinguish between good and evil. This damned the whole race, to the end of time. Comstock is a Christian, and so he cannot help reasoning, as a logical Christian must, that the only way to keep out of mischief is to remain in intellectual darkness. Certainly Christians do not usually act on this rule in ordinary business affairs, but when it comes to the facts of sexual physiology and social science they immediately run their heads into the sand and imagin that they are perfectly safe. And, not content with blinding themselvs, they are determined that everybody else shall fly to the shelter of the sand dunes of non-information or mis-information. This explains the attack on "Woman, Church, and State."

Mrs. Gage in a letter to us says that the real power behind Comstock in this crusade against her book is the local church. There is nothing intrinsically improbable in this statement. In fact, it is difficult to imagin that any other should hav made such an attack. One of the Syracuse papers heads an account of the trouble with the words "'Unclean, Unclean,' so the churchmen cry at 'Woman, Church, and State,'" showing that at least one editor understands the situation. The same paper quotes a man who for twenty-five years has been prominent in educational affairs in Syracuse as saying that, "While I hav not read the book thoroughly, I hav reviewed it sufficiently to satisfy myself that Mr. Comstock was right in condemning it for circulation in a public library." This man also says that "If not suppressed, this book is sure to hav its baneful effects," meaning, of course, that it will injure the church by showing how false is her claim that woman owes to Christianity her elevation and emancipation, so far as they hav been achieved. Other Syracuseans think that "some kind of an asylum ought to be found for Comstock." Repeal the infamous law he enforces, and he will become powerless for evil. Still others of Mrs. Gage's neighbors express their conviction that she could not write "anything morally objectionable," so refined are her mental and moral attributes. It is probable that Comstock will discover that he has aimed too high this time, and will beat as orderly a retreat as possible. A suit for damages would help greatly to transform the defeat into a rout.

"Fair Play" sends to the World this model form for an amendment to the state constitution: "No form of property, real or personal, shall hereafter be exempted by law from taxation for the maintenance of the government which assures its title." This would be an exact fit in any and every state.

Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, perhaps the most widely known leader of the Sunday law people, says that "religion cannot be maintained without the Sabbath, or the Sabbath without law." Which is equivalent to saying that Christianity would go to pieces without the hoops of statute law. What a confession! And yet in the face of this and many similar admissions Mr. Crafts and his associates hav the effrontery to persistently claim that they are working for civil, not religious Sunday laws! What sorry shammers they are!

Our Christian friends hav no more practical faith in "God's loving providence" than hav unbelievers. When there is no immediate danger they are very trustful, but they hav sense enough to scramble for themselvs when peril is imminent. On August 15th the Catholic church at Sayersville, New Jersey, was struck by lightning. Services were in progress. "The wildest excitement followed;" "a mad rush was made for the door;" "the exits were jammed in an instant." Finally the cooler headed ones allayed the excitement and order was restored. Providential care is a nice theory when one is not confronted with a condition.

"It is not a sign of character or intellect to be always giving emphasis to one's disbeliefs. If a man does not believe this thing or that, why should he trouble himself or others about it? If there is anything that he does believe, that is the thing for him to emphasize. If, indeed, he does not believe anything, the less he says about himself the better."—Sunday-School Times.

Want affirmations? Well, we affirm that Christianity stands in the way of the highest development. We affirm that one irrigating ditch is worth ten million prayers. We affirm that hard work, fair dealing, and respect for the rights of all are the best possible certificates of character. We emphasize our belief that we must abide the consequences of our own acts, your "Jesus paid it all" vicarious atonement doctrin to the contrary nothwithstanding.

They hav found in Iowa a real believer in the Bible as it was understood in the days when Christians were more ignorant and more sincere than they are to-day. His name is P. Stillmukes. He is a member of the legislature and this is what he said when he voted against woman suffrage:

"I hav always been taught and scripture says God first made man and afterward he took a rib out of the man's side, out of which he made a woman. Now, it seems to me a disgrace and an injustice to let that rib control or dictate to men in any way, shape, or form whatsoever in regard to the law-making power in this state. Therefore, I vote no."

Upon which the Clinton Herald remarks that "if Dubuque was after the biggest fool in the county to represent it in the legislature, it apparently got what it went for." This is a terrible slap at the Bible and at the Christians of past ages. Mr. Stillmukes is merely a survival. He is a Christian born out of time.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week write again to United States District Attorney W. C. Perry in regard to the case of Mr. J. B. Wise, indicted and to be tried in October for sending through the mails to Rev. H. B. Vernon a postal card bearing the transcription of a verse of the Bible. And it will add much to the weight of the letters already sent to Mr. Perry if a large number of our readers who are not regular members of the Corps will this week join in the protest against the further tormenting of the crippled old man. Fifty or one hundred additional letters may turn the scale and induce Mr. Perry to nolle prosse the suit. Will you be one of the reinforcement? Be brief, clear, dignified, and courteous. Address Mr. Perry at Topeka, Kansas.

A writer in the Saratogian, protesting against Colonel Ingersoll lecturing in the town hall at Saratoga Springs, says that no Christian need fear for the "eternal verities" because of Infidel lectures, but he must object to such use of the hall, just as, in secession days, a patriot would hav "protested against a rebel flag flying over the roof, not because he feared that the stars and stripes would be hauled down from every other flag-staff in the land, but from sheer patriotism and loyalty," meaning, undoubtedly, that Colonel Ingersoll is guilty of treason against the government of the Christian God and should be promptly suppressed out of "sheer patriotism and loyalty" to the supernatural dynasty. It seems never to hav occurred to the Saratogian's correspondent that his credentials as earthly agent of that dynasty and interpreter of its purposes are no better than Colonel Ingersoll's.

"Pretending to be a prayerful Christian, August Seel, jr., has been scattering forged checks right and left among uptown shopkeepers. He forged the name of the Gillen Lithograph Company, his employers. Seel, who is a member of the Y. M. C. A., is twenty-four years old and lives at No. 231 West Nineteenth street. When arrested he rnefully exclaimed, 'What's the good of prayers, anyway! Here I've been praying for success in passing these checks, and now I'm arrested.'"—N. Y. Advertiser.

We leave it to our Christian friends to decide whether Seel is actually a sincere Christian of shady morals or is merely masquerading as a believer in order to the more easily fleece those who are still credulous enough to think that profession of acceptance or real acceptance of antiquated dogmas is evidence of probity of character. His exclamation of surprise that his prayers had proved to be worthless to him, would point to the conclusion that he really believes in a special providence, even for thieves. This would not be at all surprising, for all history shows that men and women of the criminal classes are, with few exceptions, exceedingly superstitious.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate perceives that the appropriation of public funds to sectarian institutions "strengthens the cause of the Infidel against all churches," but it does not seem to realize the intrinsic injustice of such benefactions. It says that "Protestants stand in the way of their own interests and of purity of government when they accept the pittance of public moneys thrown to them as a sop to close their mouths against the large appropriations to Roman Catholics." In the course of a very few lines it twice uses this word "pittance" to designate what the Protestant sects receive from the states and the nation, thus unconsciously revealing the location of its most grievous wound. The plain inference is that it would not object to such a system of appropriations if it were not for the disproportionately large sums "given to Romanists by politicians for political ends." With a "fair divvy" it would not care very much for Infidel opinion. That is why it does not heed the Infidel protest against the infamous Sunday laws, which laws, so far, hav been enacted, almost without exception, at the demand of and in the interest of Protestantism.

A Sabbatarian paper givs us this precious bit of information:

"The Presbyterian tells how one man stopped Sabbath work in the Reading shops at Williamsport, Pa. He declined to work on the Sabbath, and was discharged as a man who had too many scruples for a railroad worker. He quietly informed the men who were in the shops that if they went to work he would prosecute them for violations of the Sunday law of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Seventy-five of the men declined to work the next Lord's day. The name of the sturdy upholder of the civil law was Andrew Anderson."

Under a statute embodying the principle of equal freedom, Andrew Anderson would hav been able to select his day of rest, and he would not have been able to deny to any fellow workman the opportunity to labor on Sunday. As it was, his employers had more justification for discharging him than he had to refuse to the other seventy-five men the chance to work on Sunday. This "sturdy upholder" of the Sunday statute evidently became suddenly reverential toward the law when he wished to use it as an instrument of revenge. The theocrats are welcome to his "loyalty."

It would appear that accurate knowledge of the Bible is not necessary to enable one to travel in peace and safety through "heathen" lands. Dr. Morrison writes to the London Daily News, of Lenz, the American bicyclist:

"He is gratefully remembered by all the missionaries, who praise his imperturable serenity, his endurance, his unquestionable courage. One missionary, however, lamented to me that Lenz did not possess that close acquaintance with the Bible which was to be expected of a man of his hardihood. It seems that at family worship at this good missionary's the chapter for reading was announced, when Lenz was discovered feverishly seeking the Epistle to the Galatians in the Old Testament. On the mistake being pointed out to him Lenz was in no wise discouraged; on the contrary, he declared his solemn conviction that in the United States the epistle is always reckoned a part of the Pentateuch."

We do not quite understand what the missionary means by his indirect assertion that a man of exceptional hardihood would be expected to hav a close acquaintance with the Bible, but we do understand that a traveler who cared so little for the book that he could not tell whether a particular epistle is in the Old or the New Testament, would hav a distinct advantage in a pagan land over a Bible worshiper, for he would be much more likely to look on peculiarities of religious belief and rites with a catholic eye, and would in all probability attend more strictly to his own affairs, and let those of the nativs alone.

The Congregationalist is not willing to concede that the Christian Sabbath (Sunday) depends upon civil law. In an appeal for its better observance, it says:

"If Sunday should cease to be the Lord's day, it would be because Christians hav resisted the pleadings of their own consciences concerning it. No legislature can Christianize the weekly rest day. It can only free the day from the burdens of continuous toil. But if each Christian keeps it as in his best moments it might be kept, it cannot be destroyed."

But the Crafts people are not particularly anxious about freeing "the day from the burdens of continuous toil." They are just as bitterly opposed to Sunday recreation as they are to Sunday work. They want a holy day, not a holiday. They want matters so arranged by law that every man, woman, and child must go to church on Sunday or stay at home. This is not in the slightest degree an exaggeration. It is a calm statement of fact. If the Sundayites really wished to do nothing but prevent compulsory "continuous toil"—the only kind with which any legislator has a right to concern himself in his official capacity—the whole difficulty could be settled at once, for all that would be necessary in the way of law would be a provision that no employer shall require of his employees more than six days work each week, leaving to the demands of each business or industry and the amicable arrangements of the workmen among themselvs and with their managers the determination of the rest day of each worker. Such a settlement of the question would be dictated by good sense, not bigotry, and consequently will not willingly be accepted by the clamorers for Sunday statutes that make voluntary labor and harmless amusements alike misdemeanors or crimes.

"The Open-Air Workers' Association of America" held its second annual convention in this city a few months ago. In the Independent's report of the proceedings we find this:

"In view of the difficulty experienced by preachers in getting permits from the municipal authorities for street preaching, a resolution was passed authorizing the president of the association to inquire into the cause, and also to draft a bill to be presented at the next session of the legislature, making it obligatory upon these authorities to issue such permits to lay and ordained preachers upon presentation of evidence of good character, and also to permit the distribution of religious literature in the form of tracts, circulars, and books at such gathorings."

That clergymen and other out-door speakers should be allowed all possible opportunities for carrying on their propaganda cannot in fairness be disputed by any friend of free speech. But it must be remembered that the equal rights of other people are to be considered and that on some streets assemblages could not be gathered without interfering with the business or locomotion of a large number of persons. In view of this fact it is at once evident that the local authorities are much better judges of the situation than the legislature can be, and that therefore the authority to grant licenses should be left in the hands of the local officers, subject to such general restrictions as may be necessary to prevent favoritism and other abuses. One question to the "Open-Air Worker's Association": Are you willing to extend to Freethinkers and other unorthodox lecturers the same rights and opportunities to speak that you demand for preachers? In other words, are you pleading for equal justice or special privileges?

The theocratic conspirators against our secular Constitution never tire of asserting that this government rests on the Christian religion as its foundation; and even the United States Supreme Court has said in an obiter dictum that this "is a Christian nation." Now, who should be more likely to speak authoritativly in this matter, the Covenanter clergyman of Pennsylvania and Ohio and the present-day lawyers who sit on the bench of the Supreme Court, or Washington and his compeers, statesmen who stood about the cradle of the infant nation and helped defend it in its hours of weakness and the days of deadly peril? Here is a declaration that should be written indelibly on the brain of every friend of liberty in religion. These words occur in a treaty made with the Bey of Tripoli in 1796, which treaty was signed by the hand of Washington:

"As the government of the United States of America is not in any case founded upon the Christian religion—as it has itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquility of Mussulmen—and as the said states never hav entered into any war or act of hostility against any Mohammedan nation, it is declared by the parties that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two countries."

Washington would not consent that any "pretext arising from religious opinions" should "produce an interruption of the harmony existing between" two countries whose respectiv peoples professed distinctly opposed religious beliefs, but our modern theocratic preachers and judges are eager to enact laws that will compel inharmony and stir up strife about differences of religious belief among the people of this country. The degeneration is marked and shameful.

Heaven on Trial.

CHAPTER I.—ON EARTH.

They were sitting beneath the spreading branches of a monster live-oak one beautiful afternoon, old Abraham Fife and his good wife Nancy. Away back in the rosy days of youth when life was all joy and hope, this now loving old couple had exchanged their little home 'mid the cornfields of old Indiana for one in the rough land of California. They were two of the thousands that braved the hard journey of the plains, and settled in that new-found wonderland of the early '50's. Hardy old pioneers they were, grown old and stooped in the rough grapple of that land of gold in its early days. Their children had married and gone, and left them alone at the old home on the ranch of some thousands of acres. But 'twas a lonely spot to them when the children left, and some years afterward they moved to the quiet village of Gold Hill near by, there to while away the evening time of life. Abraham was a rough old pioneer, and usually smiled at the tender side of life, but as he sat beneath the live-oak that afternoon with his good wife Nancy, his mind fell into reminiscences of the long years of his busy life, and his heart grew touchingly tender as he called up the sweet memories of those old days gone for ever.

"Well, we've had a heap o' hard work in our time, havn't we, Nancy; and there's bin lots o' dark days 'long with the bright ones."

"Yes; I think we've had our share, Abe. But they're all about over now, and I think if anybody needs a rest we do, don't you?"

"Well, I hav queer ideas about this restin' business, I guess, Nancy. My doctrin is 'at we'll work, or ought to, jest as long as there's a piece uv us, and that'll be forever."

"I'd kind o' like to hav a rest myself, Abe, and somehow I think th' old Bible doctrin is best after all."

"I know the preachers twist the thing around, an' tell o' the good times comin', but you see they'd lose their job, Nancy, if they didn't bait their hooks with the heavenly worm. I don't believe in none o' their goin' to heaven an' havin' a good time. It's all stuff. But who's that comin', Nancy?"

"That's the Rev. Mr. Jenness, the new minister. Now don't be too hard on him, Abe."

"Wants a little money for the new church, I reckon, but he can't get nothin' out o' me."

"Good afternoon, Uncle Abe."

"Good afternoon, sir. Hav a seat out here in the shade with me and Nancy."

"Thank you. I called to see if you could not help the Lord a little this afternoon, Uncle."

"What d' you want—money?"

"Yes; I want a little to help out on our church. You can't invest amiss for the Master's sake, Uncle. Any amount would be a wonderful help."

"Won't giv you a cent."

"Why not, Uncle? Wouldn't you like to see the cause of Christ advanced in our town? It takes money to build churches and fight the devil."

"Oh, we've got enough churches in town already. Can't support what we've got."

"Enough churches! Why, Uncle, you can't mean that. Don't you know that every church is a new monument for righteousness."

"Don't believe any such stuff. If we're goin' to hav any church, might jest as well all hav one. That's a plenty."

"Oh, that wouldn't do at all. While we're all working for the glory of our Master, we must each do it in our own way. You couldn't mix up the churches, Uncle. It wouldn't work at all."

"Ef you can't mix 'em up now, how'll it be by an' by?"

"Don't worry about that, Uncle? Let's fix it up on earth. I think if you will help us Methodists a little just now, the cause of our Savior will take a mighty stride forward in Gold Hill. Now what can you do for us?"

"Nothin'. We're all pullin' for the same gate, anyhow, an' I don't see the use o' supportin' so many breeds."

"But wouldn't you like to meet your good wife and all your friends over there? These churches are the only doors to heaven, and the more the better."

"Well, this thing o' goin' to heaven is a pretty mixed up business, an' I wish't I knowed a little more 'bout it."

"It's really a simple matter after all, Uncle. You build the churches, and we do the rest. Every new church increases the world's chances for heaven, and a chance for that is worth all the treasures of earth, see?"

"Tell you what I've always thought about it, sir. I believe people are goin' to get fooled in the blamed thing. I don't think we'll hav sich an everlastin' good time as you preachers make out."

"You will certainly agree that all these sorrows and cares of the troublous here will be forgotten in that glorious there. 'Tis the promis of our father and the glory of our race. Think of the days of universal joy and peace—the very ideal of our churches. Won't that be a happy time, Uncle?"

"No, it won't. This thing o' jest settin' around forever doin' nothin' 'gainst your will an' havin' a limber good time, is the biggest humbug I ever heard about. It won't do here or anywhere else, in my opinion. But I'll know some day."

"Uncle, I'm astonished. What do you mean?"

"Well, it's jest this way. This horrible evil you preachers snort around about is the work o' the Big Bein', an' a tolerable good thing after all, I guess. Ef your churches can't do no better'n try to root it out an' prepare men for heaven here or somewhere else, they'd better pull up stakes an' move on."

"We do think this world, as well as the next, would be a happier place without evil; and to make it a place of good is indeed the ideal of the churches."

"Then you can't git nothin' out o' me. When you git the world on a joy-forever basis let me know, an' I'll move out. Don't want none of it in mine. Come on, Nancy, we'll let the blamed fool scratch it out himself. Good-day, Mr. Goodworld."

CHAPTER II.—IN HEAVEN.

"Thought you never wus comm', Abe. What's bin the matter?"

"Well, I had a sorter hankerin' after th' old place, Nancy, an' somehow I couldn't shuffle off the mortal twine any sooner."

"I've bin worryin' about you good deal, Abe. I was afraid you wusn't goin' to git in."

"Thought people didn't worry up here, Nancy."

"Well, they don't, if they've—"

"Got all they want, I reckon. Why, that's jest the way it used to be down in old Californy."

"But we mustn't grumble up here, Abe. Come on, let's look around a little," and off they strolled hand in hand down the sunny paths of paradise—old Abraham Fife and his now immortal wife, Nancy. They had reached the eternal dreamland of the human race, and found themselvs really treading the holiest ground in the universe. It was the heaven of man in all the ages where the sum of all the good he has known on earth has been extracted from all the evil by some mysterious alchemy of his God. And this was the land that these two old pioneers of earth had entered to begin their stroll together down the joyous highways of eternity. After they had enjoyed the sweet associations of the redeemed of God for a thousand years, and had been constantly ministered unto by the sweet voiced angels of heaven, Abe called Nancy apart one day to one of the quiet nooks of that happy land for a good, old time earthly chat.

"I tell you, Nancy, this thing o' comin' to heaven ain't what it's cracked up to be."

"Don't go on that way, Abe. Jist be patient an' the good time 'll come by and by."

"That's what the blamed fools used to say down on earth, an' it's all an infernal humbug."

"Why, ain't you havin' a good time, Abe? You don't hav none but the very goodest of men an' things about you—no evil nor tryin' things at all."

"That's jest what I'm tired of, Nancy. I've bin potterin' 'round here fur a thousand years, an' I aint run up agin nothin' yet, an' I'll be blamed ef the thing ain't gittin' kind o' monotonous. My doctrin' is 'at you kin hav things too much your own way."

"They say this is the happiest place of anywhere, Abe, an' I reckon it must be."

"Well, I reckon it's not. Don't you recollect, Nancy, how happy we wus when I found you chirpin' around on th' old farm down in Indiany when we wus young? And how we wus more happier still when we come out to Californy an' dug gold, an' raised wheat, an' picked fruit, while the children wus growin' up? 'Course we had some rainy days, but, ah, them wus what I call happy times, Nancy."

"No use talkin' 'bout that now, Abe. It's past forever, an' we've got to enjoy this place."

"Well, I reckon we kin never hav them good times agin fur ourselvs, Nancy, but I wish't I could git back a minut' an' whisper in the ears o' them blamed fools on earth, an' tell 'm how glad they orter be 'cause they're a livin'. They're all time prayin' to git up here or some other good place, an' the fact is, Nancy, they're jest about as happy as they'll ever be, an' I wish't they knowed it, too."

"The preachers 'll get 'em around all right after 'while, I reckon, if they haven't already."

"No, they havn't yet. I wus told th' other day they wus still a prayin' to get their flocks up here, an' if they couldn't do that they wanted to turn th' old earth into a paradise an' let people wade around in good up to their necks down there. So you see, Nancy, th' ain't no more sense in their empty skulls 'an th' used to be."

"Then I suppose you'd like to whisper a word in the ears o' the preachers, too."

"No, you can't tell 'em nothin', Nancy. They think they're 'spired, an' when a man gits that way, might jest as well let him go."

"Ah, here comes our old friend Jenness this minut'. You recollect him, don't you, Abe?"

"He's th' one 't wanted to build one o' them churches down 't Gold Hill once. Yes, I recollect that chap."

"Now, don't raise a racket with him, Abe, up here. It'll be the first on record, an' that won't do."

"Good morning, Uncle Abe. I see you and Aunt Nancy got in all right."

"Took you a long time to find it out, 'pears to me."

"Now, Abe, be careful. Recollect you're in—"

"And are you not going around to the meeting this morning, Uncle?"

"What meetin'?"

"Why, the meeting of the redeemed ones."

"What they goin' to do?"

"And havn't you heard, Uncle? They meet to appoint some one—the holiest of heaven, if possible—to offer himself up for sacrifice unto the children of Mars in order that the poor sinners may be saved."

"Can't work that racket on me."

"Abe—"

"I've been 'saved' once, an' I know how it goes. One world's enough to play that game on. Yes, I'm goin' to the meetin', but I'll vote 'no' on sendin' anybody."

"I'm astonished at your flippant remark on a subject so holy. You evidently do not appreciate the privilege of taking part so directly in the plans of our father for the betterment of his creatures in all the worlds of space. You forget, sir, that you are now a most vital part of that force that directs the handiwork of the universe."

"Same old song. You wus burn for a preacher, I reckon, but you can't fool me agin. As I wus just a sayin' to Nancy, this thing o' longin' an' workin' fur heaven or anything like it is a waste o' time, an' you preachers are fools—"

"Abe—"

"To be rootin' 'round forever to find some good place to put people in. Why don't you teach 'm to enjoy th' old world jest as they find it. It's a mighty good place after all—'bout as good as you'll find anywhere, I 'spect."

"Oh, Uncle, these sweet associations and high occupations in heaven of the blessed ones of God so far transcend one's experience on—"

"Dreamin' agin, and a mighty allurin' dream it is, but when it comes to the scratch, there's nothin' in it. Comin' to heaven makes me feel 'bout like them eastern folks used to 'at come out to Californy 'specting to find gold growin' on the trees."

"But 'tis a glorious thing, Uncle, to sit triumphantly at the right hand of—"

"You're a liar. Git."

"Abe, Abe, you're in heaven now."

"Lord, I know it, Nancy, an' I'd rather be a sinner on earth than a saint in heaven any day. Wish 'at I wus back in old Californy." WEIRD WILL.

Call for the Eighteenth Annual Congress.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the American Secular Union held at the residence of Dr. Juliet H. Severance, July 28th, it was decided that the Eighteenth Annual Congress of the organization be held in Chicago, Oct. 26th, 27th, and 28th.

Various religious denominations, ignoring past differences—and the history of Christianity demonstrates that these hav been most serious—recently convened in a parliament and agreed to work in unison for the uplifting of humanity. Certainly Liberals should not display a less conciliatory spirit than the orthodox sects. Assenting to this, and remembering that only in union is there strength, the board adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Freethought Federation of America be invited to unite with the American Secular Union in holding its Eighteenth Annual Congress, and that Mrs. Freeman be requested to communicate this resolution to Mr. S. P. Putnam.

It is also urged that all societies which accept the "Nine Demands" send delegates to the Congress, and that Liberals make a grand effort to attend this Freethought Parliament. Let every auxiliary send its representativs. The World's Fair Congress was a splendid success, but this is its equal in importance. The enemy is activ, enforcing Sunday laws and securing Sunday legislation, opposing the taxation of church property, the value of which is assuming alarming proportions, securing the appropriation of public funds to sectarian institutions, demanding that the Bible be read in the public schools—in fact, not one effort to rob the people of liberty has been relinquished. The National Reform Association, the Sabbath Union, the Epworth Leagues, the King's Daughters, the Women's Christian Temperance Union—all these hav banded together, presenting a formidable front, and it will require the united efforts of Liberals to defeat so unscrupulous a foe, owning allegiance, as it readily admits, not to this government, but to a heavenly ruler, thus endeavoring to establish a theocracy on the ruins of the republic. How to best oppose this purpose and the other unpatriotic schemes of our antagonists must be considered at this Congress. We must work together, accepting this much of the wisdom of our opponents, that "those who are not for us are against us."

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN,
Cor. Sec. American Secular Union.

Progress and Force.

All the fighters, from the unscrupulous politician of a low type, who consents to trick or flatter for the advantage of himself or his party, up to the dynamiter who seeks to terrorize society for the sake of views of which he himself has but a slight understanding, are all fighting together in one vast army to render true progress impossible. Progress can never be won by the weapons of trickery, flattery, or terrorism. The use of all such weapons means the wearisome passage from one set of evils to another.—Hon. Auberon Herbert.

At the present time it is well to enforce the lesson that force and violence do far more injury, as a rule, to the cause of progress than they can possibly do good. And when we say this we are not preaching the absurd doctrin of "non-resistance," the doctrin, so to say, of passiv participation in crime, which Jesus is alleged to hav taught. There are times, without doubt, when one cannot but think that force is not alone excusable but necessary. Where there is a despot trampling on the liberties of a people, where the people hav no constitutional means of asserting their rights, where the despot, surrounded by panders and intrenched behind bayonets, strikes at the life of the people, then few there are who would withhold admiration from the brave man who, at the risk perhaps of his life, strikes back at the tyrant and assassinates the kingly assassin. But such a case is on an entirely different footing from the extraordinary inexplicable outrages of the past couple of years. The reason we applaud sometimes the man who murders a tyrant, is because we feel the murder was just, in a sense. The person murdered was himself perhaps a murderer and a public menace, and his murder or execution may be merely a disagreeable necessity, like the removal of a cancer which was sapping the vitality of the organism.

But the "Anarchist" outrages, as they are called, which hav astonished and perplexed Europe, are really as senseless as they are unjustifiable. The Anarchists allege that they desire to change, or destroy altogether, the system of society. But, manifestly, that is a general object; if society is bad, no one individual is responsible for it. As Mr. Samuels—an Anarchist, we believe, himself—has said in the London Echo, "none are guilty, yet all are to blame." And it does not seem to be pretended that the few people who are promiscuously slaughtered by the Anarchists are individually responsible for any of the evils which are condemned. What sane object there can be, therefore, in their murder, passes the comprehension of any sound intelligence. The only effect, so far, these outrages hav had is to create a horror and disgust in superficial and everyday minds of the Anarchist cause; though, of course, to every sensible person it is evidently as just to lay to the debit of philosophic Anarchism the act of every semi-insane desperado who flings a bomb in any quarter of the world, as it was a few years ago to lay to the debit of the Irish National movement every "moonlighting" outrage that occurred in Ireland. On the fringe of every movement · · · there will always be a few ignorant, or undisciplined, or criminal people who are a source of weakness to the body that has the misfortune of their attachment. And, probably, no one more deplores and reprobates these recent outrages than the real reasoned Anarchist.

It is noteworthy, too, that all or most of those arrested for these outrages are more or less illiterate, ignorant fellows. Their manifestoes and pocketbooks, and writing generally, display their mental equipment. They are also young men. Both facts explain a good deal. They are impatient of progress. They are often young men who, expecting to wake up one morning and find the millennium arrived, lose heart altogether when they find the rate of progress much slower than they anticipated. As a matter of fact, the millennium won't come in a day, or a year, or ten years; things don't move at that pace. It is very questionable whether it would be so well if they did. Nor will the millennium ever come by bomb, or terrorism, or force. It will come slowly, gradually, imperceptibly—as fast as people are prepared for it—but no faster. Before there comes a change of the outward forms of society, there must be a change in the ideals and education in what, to use the religionist's word, one might call the "spiritual" life of the people And to foist a new system on society, or attempt to do so, before that "spiritual" change, is the folly of ignorance. Hence, instead of committing outrages which merely disgust people, what these Anarchists should hav done was to try to convince the minds of the people. If they did that, the bombs would be unnecessary; if they did not succeed in convincing, all the bombs in all the arsenals of the world would not avail them. Thus it is we should say these Ravachols and Vaillants and Santos are more ignorant than depraved. Strange as it may seem to say so, theirs is not a mean crime. They hav nothing apparently to gain personally, they hav everything to lose; they imagin they are helping humanity, as Torquemada and other Inquisitors may hav thought they were serving men's eternal interest by putting them to death. Both crimes, possibly like all crimes, arose from ignorance. What is required, therefore, is education, enlightenment. These Anarchists at heart mean well. Let them but be educated, trained, disciplined, and the enthusiasm that now runs to outrage might provide a driving-force that would help humanity on the path of progress, where it now hinders and retards.—Frederick Ryan, in London Freethinker.

Thomas Paine and Republicanism in France.

Mr. Moncure D. Conway is contributing some papers to the Open Court which contain matters of great interest to all admirers of the author of the "Age of Reason." It may truly be said that the more we learn of the true facts of the life of Thomas Paine, the more do we find that shows him to hav been a man worthy of all the respect we can giv him for his clearness of vision, his nobleness of character, his unswerving loyalty to truth. It is a pitiful thing that his surroundings were such that his fearless and honest declarations of opinion should hav served to embitter the latter part of his life, by robbing him of the well-earned consideration of his fellow-countrymen, and even the friendship of some of his friends. His name and memory hav been covered with obloquy by the unscrupulous denunciations of a truculent clergy; but the day has come fortunately when there is a chance of his worth being acknowledged, and when a pulpiteer who openly vituperates him will be recognized as a conscienceless or ignorant libeler.

In the issue of July 12th Mr. Conway tells us something of the share Paine took in inaugurating the republic in France. After recalling how Lafayette sent to Washington the principal key of the demolished Bastile, "as a tribute I owe as a son to my adoptiv father, as aide-de-camp to my general, as a missionary of liberty to his patriarch," he tells us that Otto, the French agent in America, wrote that the key was regularly shown at the president's audiences; and that, though the curiosity of the Philadelphians was gratified by it, the Frenchmen there were piqued. "So little," says Mr. Conway, "did these Frenchmen realize the tremendous march of events in France, or the cause of the storm, which really was the American republic. There were evils in France, though rather fewer than in other nations of Europe, AND NONE TO EXCITE A REVOLUTION. It was a vision of a golden age across the Atlantic which possessed France. Paine wrote to Washington: 'That the principles of America opened the Bastille is not to be doubted, and therefore the key comes to the right place.'"

The words we hav italicized read rather strangely. It may, indeed, be true that there were fewer evils in France than in some other countries, but that there were none to excite a revolution is about as true of the France of a century ago as it would be of the Russia of to-day. On the question whether the revolutionists really had the deliberate notion of upsetting the monarchy and establishing a republic or not, before Paine took an activ part in events, Mr. Conway writes:

The first enthusiastic "Painite" in Paris was probably Achille Duchatelet a young nobleman, who had married an English wife, Charlotte Comyn, and knew English. He and Paine, immediately after the attempt of Louis XVI. to escape from France in June, 1791, placarded France with the first republican manifesto ever issued in Europe. The following is from Dumont's "Recollections of Mirabeau:"

"The celebrated Paine was at this time is Paris, and intimate in Condorcet's family. Thinking that he had effected the American Revolution, he fancied himself called upon to bring about one in France. · · · Duchatelet called on me, and after a little preface placed in my hands an English manuscipt—a proclamation to the French people. It was nothing less than an anti-royalist manifesto, and summoned the nation to seize the opportunity and establish a republic. Paine was its author Duchatelet had adopted and was resolved to sign, placard the walls of Paris with it, and take the consequences. He had come to request me to translate and develop it. I began discussing the strange proposal, and pointed out the danger of raising a republican standard without concurrence of the national assembly, and nothing being as yet known of the king's intentions, resources, alliances, and possibilities of support by the army, or in the provinces. I asked if he had consulted any of the most influential leaders—Sieyes, Lafayette, etc. He had not; he and Paine had acted alone. An American and an impulsiv nobleman had put themselvs forward to change the whole governmental system of France. Resisting his entreaties, I refused to translate the proclamation. · · · Next day the republican proclamation appeared on the walls in every part of Paris, and was denounced to the Assembly. The idea of the republic had previously presented itself to no one. this first intimation had filled with consternation the Right and the moderates of the Left. Malouet, Cazales, and others proposed prosecution of the author, but Chapelier, and a numerous party, fearing to add fuel to the fire instead of extinguishing it, prevented this."

Lafayette now missed his great opportunity. He was a thorough republican at heart, but did not realize that the people were also such. Both Jefferson and Paine warned him of this, but he maintained that it would be twenty years before France would be ripe for a Republic. This led Lafayette to trust to the momentary alliance of throne and people, which sank under his foot like a quicksand, and left him a prisoner in Austria. Paine, in dedicating Part II. of "Rights of Man" to Lafayette, alludes to their only difference. "That which you suppose accomplishable in fourteen or fifteen years, I may believe practicable in a much shorter period." So short was the period that when this Part II., which appeared in London, Feb. 17, 1792, appeared in the late summer in a French translation, the translator had to apologize for Paine's praise of Lafayette! "The seed sown by the audacious hand of Paine," says Dumont, "were now [June, 1791] budding in leading minds." On Sept. 21, 1792, they had borne fruit in the formal abolition of royalty.

Of Paine's private life at this period Mr. Conway writes:

Although Paine owned a house and farm at New Rochelle, near New York, and a small house and lot at Bordentown, N. J., he had not much cash. He would not accept rent from the widow who occupied the latter. His "Rights of Man" brought in a good deal of money, but he gave it all away to the various "Constitutional Societies" in England, which had sprung up to propagate his views. In order to do this he had to liv poorly. Gouverneur Morris (April 16, 1791) speaks of visiting his "wretched apartments" in Paris. That of course was all changed when he returned to Paris as the representativ of Calais in the National Convention. He arrived Sept. 19, 1792, was introduced by the Abbe Gregoire September 21, and was received with acclamations.—Secular Thought.

Don't Discourage Editorial Sincerity.

Every man has a right to take a paper or to stop it, for any reason or for no reason at all. It's a free country—in that respect. But at the same time there is a certain responsibility attaching to all actions, even to so trivial a one as stopping a paper because the editor says something one does not agree with. There is complaint that newspaper editors lack fearlessness and honesty; that newspapers are too generally mere partisan organs that disregard the claims of truth and justice when political interests are at stake. There is too much truth in the charge; but let us ask how it is possible for a fearless, honest, outspoken journal to liv if every man is to cry "Stop my paper" whenever he reads something that does not accord with his views. The men who insist that the paper they read shall never say anything contrary to their views are the ones who are in a large measure responsible for the craven cowardliness and the weathercock propensities of modern journalism. One of two things is absolutely necessary. Either a paper must be a namby-pamby sheet that has no opinions whatever about important events, or else its readers must make up their minds that a difference of opinion is not sufficient reason for stopping the paper. If all the readers insist upon it that everything said must accord with their views, then the editor must say nothing except on the one subject on which they all agree, and the public must be left for light on current events to bitter partisan papers. In a community composed entirely of these "stop my paper" people true independent journalism would be an impossibility. When convinced that a paper is dishonest and deceitful, stop it. When convinced that it is unclean, stop it. When it lacks enterprise and fails to giv you the news, stop it. When some other paper givs you more of value, stop it. But don't stop a paper that you believe to be honest, courageous, enterprising, and clean, simply because its editor has written his own sincere views instead of yours or somebody else's; for if you do, you are putting a premium on insincere journalism and serving notice on an editor that the way to succeed is to write what he thinks will best please his readers instead of what he honestly believes to be the truth.—New York Voice.

Annual Congress—Call of the Freethought Federation of America.

To the Liberals of America and Members of the Freethought Federation:

The Annual Congress of the Freethought Federation of America will be held in Chicago, Oct. 26th, 27th, and 28th, in conjunction with the Annual Congress of the American Secular Union. The importance of this Congress is great. The encroachments of the church are becoming more bold and dangerous. The attempt to amend the constitution so as to place our government on a Christian basis, and to pass a national Sabbath law are indications of the attitude of the church. It has been and is today the enemy of freedom; and we must be constantly prepared to meet its conspiracies. We can not do this as an unorganized mass. We must join forces, otherwise we shall be defeated. We need a common impulse. There must be association. Let the gathering at Chicago be the greatest yet held in America. Think of past achievments as an inspiration to something better in the future. Freethought is growing. The necessity for political action is more apparent than ever. The means of action are improving. Freethought cannot go backward; it must step forward. Now is the opportunity for union and strength. This Congress is for work Let there be an enthusiastic rally.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Pres.,
FRANKLIN STEINER, N. F. GRISWOLD, J. M. PECK, B. A. ROLOSON. } Vice-Pres.

News and Notes.

I could not go to Fort Maginnis, Montana, after all, as it would involve an extra journey of 1,600 miles, two hundred miles of which would be by stage coach; but I hav no doubt I should be amply repaid for this journey, by the warm welcome of James Furgus and other Liberals of this advance post. But the fact of it is that times are mighty hard as you go west, and since the Secular Pilgrim cannot depend on any "divine providence," but has a lasting faith in the "almighty dollar" as a means of locomotion and general welfare it does not seem best at this season of the year to travel several thousand miles without assurances of solid support. So for the present the Great West and the blue Pacific must gleam in distant splendor until the "peoples' party" and golden harvest fields and the law of supply and demand shall hav recuperated the still unexhausted resources of this vast country. It is a disappointment to me, but I look forward to a much better campaign when another summer shall gem the land.

Meantime I shall find plenty of work in Chicago and vicinity. I shall especially devote myself to the coming union congress of Liberals which I believe will be a most important gathering, and will open a new era of work to our consolidated forces. Undoubtedly there is to be a great national fight on the Sabbath question. We must meet this issue in Congress, for it will be pushed with all the perseverance of fanaticism and superstition. There never was greater need of persistent action for secular principles.

From Fargo I went to Crookston, where I arrived August 15th, and lectured on Friday evening following to a house full. The Liberals of Crookston are ready to do their level best, notwithstanding the busy harvest time and the scarcity of currency. Crookston is one of those points where I hav always had a generous welcome. It is a live place politically, and the spirit of evolution is abroad. I met Ole E. Hagen, who is one of the best political writers of the Northwest, and who conducts a paper, the Rodhuggeren, printed in the Norwegian language, where Freethought finds unquestioned expression. This is a great country for Norwegians and they are a potent factor in political movements. Norway itself in these later years is becoming wonderfully emancipated from the ancient régime, under the influence of its splendid modern literature, and the spirit of the mother country gathered from sea and mountain and the "midnight sun" is not lost upon these shining western prairies.

My old stanch friend Elias Steenerson through good and evil fortune greets the world with cheery face and makes the Secular Pilgrim feel the joy of unfailing comradeship. The minute I met him he went right to work for the success of the lectures. Joseph Matthews, treasurer of the county, keeps his colors flying. The bigoted religious element made a desperate fight against him, but were woefully defeated. He asks no favors of priest or king. He has faith in the people and they stand by him. Wm. Munch is one of the "wheel horses" of the Liberal cause. He is on hand every time, be there many or few to labor. He is enrolled for "Four Hundred Years."

With Elias Steenerson I went out to the big farm of Peter Cornelius, who was one of the first to break soil in this county. His acres stretch away in fruitful glory and the music of harvest rolls along without a note of superstition. Hon. B. Sampson is also a pioneer of this country, who has been honored by his fellow-citizens in the councils of the state, and who believes in the magnificence of mother earth, and takes no stock in celestial mansions. He has converted I know not how many clergymen, for in the early days he used to entertain them with kindly hospitality and solid facts. P. M. Ringdal is also one of our best men at this point, thoroughly radical, a leader in reform, and at the coming election will no doubt be chosen a representativ of the people. Judge Frank Ives, who has grown gray in the cause of freedom, is still in the prime of life, for he delights in hunting and fishing, and nature has endowed him with her splendid vitality. He believes in the "good time coming," when justice shall prevail. Law to him is common sense and not merely a hoary precedent. J. O. Lundet, Messrs. Jacobson, Jennings, Halston, and Hans Morberg are on the roll of Crookston's Liberal League, and rally for the "Rights of Man." It is a good sign that quite a number of ladies were present at the lecture and show an eager interest in the great questions of the day. L. Bjorge, De Forest Bucklen, J. Estby, and M. J. Ringdal are now enrolled for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator.

Crookston has a population of about 4,000; and the country around it is one of the finest in the Northwest. The crops this year are generally good. Fair prices will remove the stress. The railroads, however, hold a great deal of unimproved property, and refuse to sell except at high rates. This retards prosperity. There are, I understand, mortgages to the extent of $2,000,000 in this county. The rate of interest is from 10 per cent to 18 per cent. This makes a drain of over $200,000 a year from the wealth of the county, which might otherwise go into improvements and local trade. This is the condition of vast portions of the West. It is no wonder there is a tremendous upheaval, and a desire to remove in some way this desolating burden. The people are industrious and progressiv, and will no doubt struggle through to permanent prosperity. It is evident that science and Freethought hav a mission in this direction.

I leave Crookston early on Saturday, and travel by rail to Grafton, North Dakota. The first one I meet as I step from the cars is John Ildstad, of the Merchant's hotel, where all wise travelers will take up their quarters, if they want a good meal and excellent attendance. Ildstad is a Freethinker from away back, a TRUTH SEEKER man, and of course he is stanch and true. He knows how to keep a hotel, as all the country will testify. The churches try to boycott him, but it is no good. The traveling public know a good thing when they see it, and don't mind the priest. He took me at once to his hotel. After dinner I take the stage for Hoople, a pleasant little town fourteen miles distant. John Cosley, a business man from Chicago—an inventor and a Freethinker, whom I met at Fargo, and who subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER—happened to strike me at Grafton, and concluded to stay over Sunday at Hoople and hear the lectures; and so I had him for a traveling companion, and we enjoyed a delightful journey through the splendid harvest fields. This is the most productiv country I hav yet passed through. The wheat is of the finest quality, with from twenty to thirty bushels to the acre. Field after field stretches away, with luminous ranks like a vast golden floor, with tufts of green groves adorning the glowing horizon. The music of machinery is heard, the dark forms of busy men and patient horses mingling with the cloud-like spray of straw, which tumbles and gleams into mountains of gold. It is an exquisite scene, and all day long one can travel through this spacious land, and witness the glorious transformation of bearded grain in slaughtered ranks to the beautiful wealth of flowing kernel, a bloodless victory, more glittering than any ever won by sword or cannon. Hoople has about twenty houses, I guess, half a dozen stores, three big warehouses, two churches, two ministers, and as goodly a company of Liberals as I ever struck. I could not hav come at a more unfavorable time for lectures, for it was the hight of harvest; but I gave four lectures, and the schoolhouse was full every time. They came from Crystal, Park River, Conway, and Grafton. Some from a distance of twenty-five miles. I enjoyed every bit of my time at this frontier town, which is only about three years old. There is an occidental breeziness about it, a good cheer, and racy fellowship that you can't find anywhere except in these clusters of dwellings that seem to be dropped down all of a sudden on the prairie like a big ship; and all sorts of travelers are abroad. There are almost as many nationalities as houses, and there is a cosmopolitan vivacity about the place that is quite surprising and enjoyable. It seems as if a bit of Broadway or the Bowery had been transplanted to Dakota. Of course Liberalism would flourish in a town like this, where people are independent and alert, and well informed, hav had experience, hav traveled and hustled and tussled and met every kind of fortune and pushed ahead. and are in sympathy with all the live questions of the day.

They hav an organization of Liberals here, with a membership of over thirty, and it is a live organization, too, and willing to do duty.

M. A. Hewitt is the first to greet me. He arranged for the lectures. He takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and is imbued with its spirit. He took me at once to his home, where I had a cordial welcome. Mr. George Johnston, treasurer of the League, is from the land of Burns, and breathes the poet's generous thought, although he knows what Scotch Presbyterianism is. The Francis family are all Liberals. and a good company they make; they hav traversed the broad and cheerful path of Universalism. J. E. Flanigan gave me the hospitality of his table. He is ready to do his share, and so is L. T. Berdahl, stanch as the pines of Norway, and Nels Swansen and Leif Jordshangen; also A. D. Marble, Thomas Simons, R. R. Farrel, W. L. Hewitt, Crist Ellengston. These are some of the friends I met here; I cannot name them all. Mr. M. B. Bronson, L. T. Berdahl, and Thomas Simons join the lists of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, and Leif Jordshangen enrolls for "Four Hundred Years" and TRUTH SEEKER. The ladies are not afraid to join our forces. Mrs. W. C. Francis, Mrs. Helen Hewitt, Mrs. A. D. Marble, Mrs. Frank Francis, and others. It will be seen that Hoople makes a good showing, although the two churches try to frown down Liberalism. The schoolhouse is here also, a handsome structure, in which the lectures were given.

Mr. John C. Risvold and C. E. Anderson, of Grafton, were present at every lecture, and are enrolled for "Four Hundred Years." Mr. and Mrs. Ustad came over on Sunday afternoon. John J. Kohnen and E. Smith Peterson, of Park River, were also present, and T. E. Voracbep and Mr. Black from Conway. Some of our Liberal friends are running on the Populist ticket, and I hope they will be elected, and it looks as if they would. There is a mighty current of Populism in this country, I find. The Liberals are mostly that way, though not all. Of course there is an honest difference of opinion as to which party will best serve the people. I shall vote for the Freethinker anyway, if he sticks to his colors.

I leave Hoople Tuesday morning, August 21st, by stage for Grafton. I arrive Tuesday night at Fargo, where I remain until morning. There is a Populist rally at Fargo and I attend it. Hon. F. J. Thompson gives us the mathematics of politics, a very sensible discourse. He has made a study of this matter, and it looks as if he was right. I camped out in Ballon's tent that night, under the shadow of the Unitarian church. It was quite a luxury; there was plenty of circulation; not a ghost haunted me, and I slept sound.

I leave Fargo Thursday morning. Mrs. Dr. Darrow and children journey as far as Wisconsin on the same road, and so I had a pleasant day's travel, for the doctor's family are all Liberals.

I expect before Christmas to return to Fargo, Crookston, Grafton, Hoople, Conway, and Park River, and deliver a series of lectures. The interest already created demands still further work. I hope to arrange for other lectures along this route where the opening has been so favorable.

I am now in Chicago. I shall lecture here the first Sunday in September, and begin work for the Freethought Congress. We must hav funds, and I hope there will be a generous response. I shall report progress every week.

Observations.

At a recent meeting of the Prohibitionists, ex-Governor St. John of Kansas, being a speaker on that occasion, painted a picture of the judgment day, introducing a man who had died a drunken murderer, with the saloon-keeper who sold him the liquor, and a deacon whose vote had legalized the traffic. The picture is said to hav been uproariously funny; the audience laughed long and loud, and St. John, much encouraged, declared that he had no doubt God and the angels would chuckle over such a scene. The Sun, which holds that clergymen, being ecclesiastics, should abjure secular concerns, and which itself, being secular, yet indulges in much religious flubdub, charges the speaker with blasphemy. But Dr. Funk, of the Voice, advances to the defense of the Kansas orator, and argues that, since the almighty has endowed man with mirth, there is no reason to suppose that the deity lacks that faculty. By parity of Dr. Funk's reasoning, since man possesses all the undesirable qualities over which we mourn, including thirst for the ardent, we must conclude that his creator also enjoys them, but that is not to the point. The Prohibitionist editor is unquestionably correct on the subject of divine hilarity, for we are assured by the Bible, a sort of posthumous work of the Christian God, that he will laugh at our calamity and mock when our fear cometh. Read Proverbs i, 26, and look happy.

Mv Uncle Benjamin Tucker's paper, Liberty, which is the only living exponent of philosophical Anarchism, has laid its chastening hand upon thy servant. Verily, I am accused of being too violent in my condemnation of those gentlemen who clear a trail to the gallows by the use of dynamite bombs that fall alike upon the just and the unjust. I hav pointed out that the believers in dynamite warfare hav no grievance if the officers of the law punish them, eviscerate or decapitate them, for that is exactly what they propose to do to such officers. I hav also pointed to the superior fairness of the state, which professes to distinguish between the guilty and the innocent, or at least between the accused and the unaccused, before inflicting the death penalty, which the dynamiters do not. Now Liberty explains that the case of the Anarchists does not rest upon the injustice of courts so much as upon the crimes and blunders that inflict punishment without the formality of indictment or trial. "By its monopolies, privileges, taxes, and aggressions of all kinds," says Liberty, "the state condemns millions of men, women, and children to starvation, misery, despair, and death. These are not tried and found guilty of anything; their punishment is inflicted without any formalities; they are innocent of wrong doing." This indictment of the state may be true without affecting the merits of its case against the Anarchists. As I hav said, the state differentiates the innocent and guilty, or professes to. I think it hanged four men in Chicago in order to be sure of the right one, though without success, but the fact is not generally admitted and perhaps cannot be proved. The Anarchists, however, who would blow up a residence, a tenement house, or a restaurant, and kill its occupants to spite its owner, hav not even the benefit of a doubt. The method they avow and inculcate is indiscriminate slaughter.

Not only do they slay the innocent with the guilty or accused, but their atrocities giv the lawmakers excuse for more stringent enactments, through which the innocent suffer again. Against the miseries caused by the monopolies, privileges, taxes, and other aggressions of the state, may be placed the good which it performs—the protection of the weak, the punishment of the guilty, the feeding of the hungry and clothing of the naked. Admitting that the account does not balance, still these things are worth something, while the dynamiters havn't a single mark to their credit. They are an unmitigated evil.

But who is the state, with monopolies, privileges, taxes, and other aggressions?—The people. Who suffer from the foregoing list of things?—The people. The state, then, inflicts wounds upon itself. Let the Anarchist take a lesson from the state and displode his bomb in his own midst.

A monthly magazine called Woman is published at Richmond, Va. It is devoted to the female cause. In the July number, which some unidentified friend has sent me, appears what the editor calls a unique symposium on "Men Who Make the Best Husbands," republished from Demorest's Family Magazine, and among the symposiasts is that long-eared symposiass, Anthonv Comstock. Instead of writing to the question, What sort of a man makes the best husband? Comstock takes up the subject of heredity and essavs to say what kind of men make the best fathers. Now, what Anthony Comstock knows on this subject he has learned from men whose writings he read in order to suppress them. His business is to arrest writers who would instruct the ignorant male in the art of being a good husband. Whether or not he is himself a satisfactory conjugal mate has not been divulged by Mrs. C., but the Alphite ladies certainly would not choose for a husband a lusty brute of his proportions and propensities, who spends his time searching literature for what there may be in it that is obscene.

Comstock and his confrères are not desirable individuals. There was the president of the Paris Society for the Suppression of Vice, who seduced one woman and married another, after the style of Breckinridge, the first woman committing suicide. There is Bennett, of the San Francisco Society, who reversed the order, marrying one woman and seducing another; and the rest of these "agents" are not much better. Yet Comstock is rather more despicable than they are, for while they follow a law of nature which they were not manly enough to resist, he procured a law of the state which he is mean enough to enforce. The question then, it seems to me, is not how a man shall be either a good husband or a good father, but rather how, being a husband and a father, he shall avoid raising a son to mature in the likeness and character of Anthony Comstock. If there is anything in prenatal influence, then the way Comstock is impressing himself on the modern female's attention is a source of imminent peril to the unborn generation.

"Sketches in Rhyme" is a volume of verses by Jeaf Sherman. I hav never before met with any poetry from the same pen, but I take it that Jeaf is not an apprentice at the business. He is no amateur rhymer like myself, and I do not suppose that you could hire him for $2 to toss off a poetical advertisement, as I hav done. At the same time he can write tours de force, while if I were asked to compose one, I should be stuck. The words tours de force signify feats of strength or skill, and poetry-making is often neither. In a sort of preface, under the head of "Poeture," Mr. Sherman says that the poet must be an artist with a psychic brush and pencil wherewith to outline what the soul has viewed with inner vision. How many rhymers there are who, as Professor Huxley might express it, hav remarked "nothing analogous to that process!" Poetry, Jeaf goes on, must be evoked bv dawn, the stars, the somber wood, the coiling river, or the placid lake. That was what I supposed until I tried it; then I discovered that these phenomena did not inspire me, being better adapted to fishing. The thoughts at such a time do not get an action on themselvs. It is no disadvantage to make a few notes and to jot down suggestions, but one can turn out superior copy at home after the baby is asleep and the wife has quit asking how much longer you are going to sit up. To write poetry handily, you need to hav some work on prosody from which to select an appropriate measure; a rhyming dictionary may be utilized, and a book of svnonymes will save much scratching of the head. The male poet should remove his collar and necktie, turn back his cuffs, and let down one suspender, if the evening be warm. The costume will not be visible in the published work, even though the poet wear long hair, a low-necked shirt, and a soft hat.

If it were possible to be inspired by objects in nature—which I shall not deny—I should say that Mr. Sherman had been so affected, for his verses are the poetry of nature highly idealized; not the roar of the surf, which is less noisy than an elevated train, nor any of those violent things that are supposed to find an echo in the majestic measure and thunderous period of the bard; these, I think, Mr. Sherman would regard as rather vulgar; on the contrary, he tackles the rosebud, the forget-me-not, birds alive or dead, wild geese, life in its varied aspects, dream faces, moonlight, love, and so forth. The result is pleasing, like a soft wind against your face. Nothing exciting about it—a sort of Ethical Society calm. There is not a battle-cry, a warwhoop, nor a bugle-blast in the book, which is, therefore, just a trifle too quiet. If a guyrl should say it was sweet pretty, I should acknowledge that her powers of description exceeded mine. No one could possibly speak a harsh word of "Sketches in Rhyme." I do not know why they are not as good poetry as the rhymes of Browning, or Keats, or Wordsworth, or Oscar Wilde. They effervesce, I might say, but lack body. The next time Jeaf goes to the fountain of poetic fizz-water, he should giv the attendant a wink.

Quite a different work is "Hell and other Poems," by J. H. Stevenson, price 50 cents, the Rigby-Ramsey Printing Company of Kansas City, Mo., being the publishers. Stevenson is a better poet than John Bunyan, but lacks his devoutness. He is a less skillful versifier than Jeaf Sherman, but surpasses him in intellectual muscularity. He is also more blunt. Jeaf wouldn't say hell if you gave it to him. But Stevenson's title, "Hell and Other Poems," is not a good one, for hell is not a poem. It is a condition rather than a threnody. This poet rejects the dogma of everlasting perdition, but sustains great hopes of a life beyond the grave nevertheless. He also turns the Bible under as an inspired work, while retaining the deity for general purposes. Some of his verses are well constructed and others are not. He is down on free trade like everything, and hitches his Pegasus to the protectionist band wagon. Obituary poetry, therefore, comes natural to him, and a patient that he plants with a mortuary tribute is dead for keeps. Toward the ladies he is not wanting in gallantry, and, addressing a young Southern bride, he sings:

> Hail, peerless one! We welcome thee
> With joy to our community.
> Though cold may seem our northern parts,
> 'Tis ever sunshine in our hearts.

There is nothing like standing up for the climate of the section in which you reside, and a person with the center of the solar system resident in his chest may still be cordial, though his northern parts are exposed to the weather. Stevenson is not oblivious to the beauties of the seasons nor the warm precincts of the cheerful day, but he is fond of philosophizing. He spatters his ink over the Bible worthies like Lot and Jacob, and makes them look worse than ever, instead of obliterating them as a modest person might seek to do. These poems feel the influence of the adjacent mountains, being somewhat Rocky.

Both poets, whose works are here discussed hav been in Chicago. This is how it impressed Stevenson:

> The women scowled and fiercely growled
> As "rip!" their dresses would go;
> And men enraged became engaged
> In giving blow for blow.
> They crowded all the tramway cars,
> And still they came in flocks,
> And on the steamboats they were packed,
> Like herrings in a box.
> Oh, the snatching and the scratching,
> And sudden shrieks of pain;
> And the stumbling and the tumbling
> In getting on the train.

Poet Sherman's view was more peaceful, as he saw the White City by moonlight:

> The phosphor queen of the night arose
> From the white embrace of the sea
> And bidding the verge an adios,
> She silvered a path to me;—
> A path that allured the vision, where
> Down a silver-lit lagoon,
> The domes of a city, poised in air,
> Shone white in the light of the moon.

MR. EDITOR: We hav received several copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please send us no more of your Infidel publications. We burn them up just as soon as we receive them. MR. EDITOR: A few of the friends of Freethought in Port Angeles hav been discussing the formation of a temperance and social order, similar in its scope to the Good Templars, but recognizing no Christian or theological dogmas like that organization.

If yourself or any of your readers can send me any information, such as by-laws, etc., of any existing Freethought temperance society, I shall be very pleased to see and make use of the same. Fraternally yours. ERNEST BURNS.

CINCINNATI, O., Aug, 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you herewith two clippings from the Cincinnatti Commercial Gazette The large clipping was in the paper on July 28, 1894, and the smaller one on July 29. About a month ago there was another article in the Commercial Gazette on taxation of church property, and in same it was stated that the information had been obtained from "Church Property," published by the Truth Seeker Co. of New York. That article merely gave the values hereabout, and did not giv any arguments. I sent each of the papers here a copy of "Church Property," and it appears to hav done some good.

Some one in every city ought to send the daily papers copies of this pamphlet, which is certainly excellent.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

As I was traveling through several different countries in Europe, I noticed a few things that I cannot help mentioning here. One thing is, that where we found the largest churches and where they were the most numerous, there is where we found the people the poorest and the most ignorant, and we can call it slavery. At one place in Switzerland we stopped a day, and as we took a walk down a street at the edge of the village we passed on one side of the road a magnificent structure, a church, and were told it was under construction about thirty years. It had six large bells, they alone costing thousands. In the same inclosure, which was more like a park than anything else, stood another fine structure, the parsonage. Near this mansion were several beautiful shade trees; under these trees was a table with a snow-white cover, and it was loaded down with everything good to eat and several bottles of red wine; around this table were seated four red-cheeked and round-faced clergymen, chatting and smiling, having a fine old time. On the other side of the road was a meadow. There we saw three women—bare-headed, sleeves rolled up, sunburnt—mowing. In front of us, coming toward us, a girl of about twelve summers and her mother pulling a load of manure, with ropes across their breasts and guiding the tongue of the wagon with their hands up the hill to a field a good ways out

We stood still, and I said to my partner, "Now look at this picture on one side of this road and then on the other; now these poor slaves, especially the women and children in this country, are the ones who feed and keep these blood-suckers, as you see them yonder at the table. I would like to know whether these poor peasants could be any worse off if they had no churches, had no parsonages, and had no clergy? But, according to the Bible, this is true Christianity. Yours truly,

J. F. HANENSTEIN.

The Evangelistic Car of the American Sunday School Union.

WAYLAND, IA., Aug. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose clipping from the Burlington Hawkeye advertising the raid the sky-pilots are going to make through Iowa with the car "Good News." They are going to pump superstition into the children of the great state of Iowa.

You will see by the puff in the Hawkeye that they claim that Marshall Field, Carson Pierce, Scott & Co., P. D. Armour, and many other Chicagoans contribute every year to the Sunday School Union a sum of money that it takes three and four figures to represent; but just at this time they say nothing about what George M. Pullman givs them.

I hav learned that the American Protectiv Association is giving aid to the sky-pilots who are to raid Iowa with the gospel car "Good News."

The Wrong of the Law Should Be Exposed.

COOK, NEB., July 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Would it not be a better plan for J. B. Wise to plead guilty to the charge of sending obscene matter through the mails and ask for mercy at the hands of the court, than to fight the indictment? Let the charge be sustained by the court that the Bible is an obscene book, and it would be a blow from which the religion of the Bible could never recover. The case could be managed so that the punishment would be nothing more than a small fine. I would be pleased to giv $5 for a decision that puts the Bible in the obscene class. Oh, but it would be too rich.

Respectfully, W. P. BROOKS.

[But a confession of guilt would not be nearly so valuable as would a verdict of either guilt or innocence, rendered by a jury, and it would not hav a hundredth part of the publicity. We want to put the Bible on a plane of equality with other books.—ED. T. S.]

Fear of Hell Not Much Good.

VALERIA, IA., Aug. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.15—$2.50 to apply on subscription and the remainder for "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," "Miracles and Miracle Workers," and "Age of Reason and Examination of the Prophecies." I wish to say to Mr. John Peck, "Here is my heart and my hand," and that the needs of the people he well understands, both politically and spiritually. And, Mr. Editor, I wish to say to you that we are glad that your pages are open to both sides of any question that concerns the welfare of the people in general. Every man should hold himself open to conviction and should be perfectly willing to hear both sides of any question under discussion, and anyone who is not has one side full of conviction and the other full of prejudice. How could any court giv a just decision without hearing evidence on both sides? Let me say that if a man never reads any other paper than a Republican and listens to no other arguments, he will always be a Republican, right or wrong. Friends, let not prejudice reign within your mortal bodies; for where prejudice reigns justice cannot.

I wish also to say that fear never made a man good in the proper sense of the word. Fear has a tendency to prevent crime, but where the way of escape is easy for the criminal, as when he can cast his crimes all on Jesus and he will bear them, and you, Mr. Criminal, go scot free, the fear of punishment has but little tendency to prevent crime. Our good and best men are those who hav a desire to do good and would not do an injustice to their fellow-man, even if they knew they would escape all punishment. Those are the men in whose hands we can trust our lives and our property.

The drouth has affected us very seriously here and money matters are very close, but I will donate some to help defend Mr. J. B. Wise, of Kansas. I would do this if I belonged to the orthodox church, in order that justice might rule in place of prejudice. L. E. C. VERNOCOM.

A Very Good Creed.

SOLDIERS' NATIONAL HOME,
MILWAUKEE Co., WIS., Aug. 17, 1894.

Hav I, you ask, a creed?
What use are they?
Do right! fills every need
From day to day.
I hav more faith in bread
When freely given
Than in holy scripture read
As way to heaven.
In words I put no trust—
They're poor indeed;
There's friendship in a crust
To one in need.
To dear old age I bow—
This I revere—
And childhood sweet, I vow
I love them dear.
To lovely womanhood
My honor plight,
And for my country's good,
If need be, fight.
To do while here my best,
For life is brief;
To answer love's behest,
Is my belief.
And thus to all I know
Who hav a need
Sweet charity bestow—
This is my creed.

HENRY CUSHING HIGGINSON.

Why Assist the Y. M. C. A.?

August 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In my rambles over the states and territories as well as the Canadian provinces, I hav an excellent opportunity to see the working of the church element, and I cannot fail to see the almost innumerable schemes and methods to draw everyone possible into their clutches to increase their income and array their forces more powerfully against Rationalism and Freethought.

While I do not question their motivs or sincerity in general, yet I do know and believe still more that many of the ministers with whom I converse are at heart and in belief as skeptical as I, but, like the legislators of our country, they consult their pocket-books more than all else.

No attorney-at-law could devise more ways to win his case, right or wrong, than the ministers who stand upon the rostrums of our present day. They are not content to preach the gospel as they understand it and allow their hearers to digest it for themselvs, but they resort to every intrigue conceivable to force their convictions upon others when they fail in a legitimate way so to do.

Church spires greet our eye at every turn of the road, under which are held many expository, class, prayer, and other services, as well as the Christian Endeavor children's promotion meetings and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union meetings while nearly every city of size has its Young Men's Christian Association halls, in which the young men are taught the dogmas of the church.

No one appreciates the benefits of the Young Men's Christian Association more than I, or is more willing to assist its progress, yet it was instituted under the auspices of the church for a proselyting purpose, believing they could thereby gradually gather in those they could not by other means. The same is true of the Salvation Army, which toots its horns on the streets, and is the means of "gathering many in out of the wet," that might otherwise be lost to the Christian fold. After every conceivable plan has been utilized, they then importune our legislatures to fill the churches by law, or at least to force obedience to their dictates. However, the latter plan of force is nothing new, for it has ever been the way of the "followers of the Lord," from the time of Moses to the present, to persecute, maim, and kill "to the glory of God," and when there were no heretics to burn as "a sweet smelling savor," they hav quarreled with those of dissenting views, and each has fought to show which had most of the spirit of love and God in his soul. So we need not wonder that bigotry entails persecution, and as ignorance is the parent of bigotry, we need not wonder that the Catholic church (being more shrewd and politic than the Protestant), is trying to destroy our public schools.

They know that a simple secular education clears the road for future development, and works an injury to religious creeds. While I would not remove one shingle from any church edifice, yet I would strike down, as an enemy to civilization and good government, the hand that would wantonly remove one brick in the walls of our public schools. True it is that science is as yet but a child in swaddling clothes, and must be first taught truths that can be demonstrated before it can teach the same to others, yet it is all we hav to go by, and we must stand upon the small fortress we already hav and try to enlarge the foundations for future use.

Fear not, you of pure minds, but sow your seed of Freethought where're you are, where're you go. Dig deep the sluiceways of knowledge that the great swamp of malarial intolerance be drained of its devastating death. Cut through the jungle of superstiton so that the sunshine of ethical and spiritual truth may kill the fatal germs. The aura of better conditions already surrounds us; the spirits of Paine, Jefferson, et al, speak to us in confident tones, and we need not fear. Subscribe to as many of our noble Freethought periodicals as possible, and when you hav read them and digested the thoughts found therein, pass them over to some neighbor that he may grasp the thoughts of others, and flee from the evil of his ways to reach that haven of toleration that is eventually to create "peace on earth and good will to men." I find Freethinkers wherever I go, and others who seem eager to hear the truth, and it is an easy matter to overcome the arguments of priest or laity, for they hav no foundation for their faith; and with courteous argument, given in a spirit of friendship, no Freethinker who will study well the literature now obtainable, need fear to express his opinion, and back it up by facts that speak louder than words.

Editors See What the Conviction of Wise Would Involve.

ATCHISON, KAN., July 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: J. B. Wise, who has been imprisoned in the Leavenworth jail for shocking the modesty of a minister by sending him an extract from his own beloved Bible, is receiving the sympathy of the intelligent people of this vicinity, and he certainly deserves their sympathy. Rev. Mr. Vennum has, by causing the arrest of Mr. Wise, publicly challenged the immorality of the Bible. He was probably ignorant of the fact that he was charging the Bible with being indecent. But if all the preachers in America were honest enough to admit the truth they would admit the obscenity of the Bible. As soon as Mr. Preacher concedes this, just so soon will he lose his salary.

I hav not read the Leavenworth papers and do not know how they are speaking of Mr. Wise. I quote the following from the Atchison papers:

The Globe says: "J. B. Wise, an old man living in Leavenworth [In Clay Center.—ED.], has been arrested and sent to jail for cutting a verse out of the Bible, pasting it on a postal card, and sending it to a certain preacher. The charge is sending obscene literature through the mails. If the charge is sustained it will be rough on the Bible."

The Patriot says: "J. B. Wise, an old man, has been arrested and sent to the Leavenworth county jail for writing a verse from the Bible on a postal card and mailing it to a certain preacher. If Wise is convicted the Bible will hav to be declared obscene."

My father is away from home, but he will do all he can for Mr. Wise, who is his good friend. The Rev. Mr. Vennum has, by causing the arrest of an aged man and a lover of truth, proved himself a bigot of the rankest kind.

Yourself and the two Doctors Foote should receive the praise of all good Freethinkers for the manner in which you are defending Mr. Wise.

Yours in defense of Liberty,

C. B. REMSBURG.

Thomas Paine, the Patriot.

FORT STANTON, N. M., June 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you for publication an essay on Thomas Paine, America's greatest patriot, by one of our students at the New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanical Arts. I desire its publication to show to the world that some of our schools at least are turning out patriots instead of religious bigots.

I tried to induce our local paper, whose editor claims to be a Freethinker, to publish it, but he declined, though well knowing it contained only historical facts concerning the great American hero. Our cause has too many such Liberals occupying editors' chairs. It would be just as well for the Freethought cause if they were in China. J. N. COE.

Thomas Paine was born in Thetford, England, January 29, 1737. His father was a Quaker staymaker, and being poor Thomas received but an indifferent education at the grammar school at Thetford. He, however, acquired a wide range of knowledge by private study, while working at his trade of staymaking in London, Dover, and Sandwich. He was engaged in several different vocations in the early part of his life, but the study of literature was his chief delight, which he turned to account later on.

At the age of thirty-eight, Paine, attracted by the struggle just then beginning in America, proceeded there, where he found immediate employment as editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine. He soon attracted the attention of all the colonists by writing and publishing a pamphlet styled "Common Sense." "which struck the keynote of the situation by advocating independence and a republican form of government." For this pamphlet the Pennsylvania Legislature granted him £500 in recognition of its value. "This pamphlet," some one has said, "hastened the Declaration of Independence six weeks; and if the Declaration had been delayed for that length of time the battle of Long Island would hav been lost, and, in all probability, it would not hav been declared at all." Cobbet said, "Whoever wrote the Declaration, Paine was its author."

Paine soon quit his post as editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine and enlisted in the army of Washington as a private soldier. Here he did valuable service to the young republic; for, when the American cause was looking doubtful; when soldiers were leaving the ranks in crowds, their terms of enlistment having expired; when people were entertaining the idea of surrendering, Paine came out with a series of pamphlets styled "The Crisis," the opening words of the first of which were: "These are the times that try men's souls." This work gave the people new enthusiasm; caused the ex-soldiers to re-enlist without being asked; and spurred the flagging spirits of the colonists on to more vigorous action. Washington had some numbers of this pamphlet read to his whole army. Paine, in place of profiting by these important writings, gave to each state a copyright free of charge. Congress soon saw that he deserved a higher position than that which he occupied in the army, so it appointed him Secretary of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. In 1781 he and Colonel Lawrence were sent to France, on a scheme of his own origination, to secure a loan from that country. The result was a gift to the states of six million livres and a loan of ten million more.

Near the close of the war a disbandment of the army was looked for on account of scarcity of money. To ward off this Paine started a private subscription, giving his own salary as a starter. In this manner £300,000 were secured, which were used in the capture of Cornwallis.

After the war was over, he could hav lived in America an honored citizen, but this was not the mission of this great man, to liv for himself alone. His motto was: "Where liberty is not, there is my country," and he carried it out to the letter. As soon as the American colonists were free he turned his attention to England's people—to "open their eyes," as he expressed it.

Soon, in answer to Burke's reflections on the Revolution in France, he wrote "The Rights of Man," a great work, which pleased the French and the common people of England, but was met with great opposition by the ruling classes of England. So opposed were they to this work that they took every means to suppress it, and sent a warrant after Paine himself; but happily he had taken passage for France a few minutes before it could be served.

Here he was met with great joy by the people of France, who elected him to the National Convention. All went very well until the trial of Louis XVI., when Paine plead for the monarch's life. For this he was soon thrown into prison by Robespierre and other renowned devils of that era. While lying in prison he wrote a book concerning his religious views, styled "The Age of Reason," which criticised the Bible and Christianity, but which taught fine morals and held to the belief that there is a supreme being. This book, which he had published, brought down a storm upon his head on both sides of the Atlantic. His good Christian friends in the United States, whom he had helped to free from the galling yoke of Britain, deserted him in the hour when he needed their help most. Washington, whose praise has been sung in every land—that man whom the world has called good and great—that man whom Paine aided to gain his fame and greatness—Washington, I say, would not turn over his little finger to extricate Thomas Paine from the dungeon where he was lying amid filth and vermin, half fed, half clothed, and each instant expecting to hear his death sentence.

Truly, his death sentence was pronounced, but the jailer placed the death mark on the open cell door, and the door being closed the executioners did not see it, so he was spared until Monroe, our minister to France, secured his release. But his health was broken, and he was never the same man again. He came to the United States and lived a secluded life until his death in 1809.

Of all the ingratitude ever done to an American hero, Thomas Paine received, and still receives, the most; for instead of placing Paine's name alongside of Franklin's in history, it is excluded altogether. And why? Simply because he chose to speak his mind in public, which Franklin, although of the same religious belief, did not do. At the Centennial at Philadelphia, 1876, all relics of Paine were excluded, as his name has been from history.

Even to this day most all good Christians regard him as a heretic, a blasphemer, a lying Infidel, a drunken braggart, a man fit only for the clutches of Father Nicholas, and they teach their children likewise. If any of these good Sunday-school fathers or mothers, who whip their children for going fishing on Sunday, should catch one of their youthful offspring reading the "Age of Reason," they would instantly regard him as born for the plutonian shore, and thrash him accordingly.

Ladies and gentlemen of the societies, although Thomas Paine has been persecuted, lied about, and censured, a greater philanthropist never trod the American soil. He it was who defended liberty in all its forms—liberty in government, liberty in body, and liberty in religion.

Show me a man who, unsolicited, gave himself, body and soul, to the American cause, and I will show you Thomas Paine; show me a man who devoted his life to the elevation of his fellow-man, and I will show you Thomas Paine; show me a man who sought out and walked hand in hand with liberty, defending her with drawn sword, and I will show you Thomas Paine; show me a man who stood on high waving the flag of reason and speaking his mind against the world, and I will show you Thomas Paine, and lastly, show me a man who was persecuted, spat upon, trampled in the mud, and covered with falsehoods, on account of his views, and I again will show you Thomas Paine.

[Note.—The foregoing biography was composed by Elgin B. Holt, 1894, and delivered by the same before the Columbian and Cardalian societies of the Agricultural College.]

Teach the Bible in the Public Schools.

HAVANA, CUBA, July 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Some heedless persons kill their friends with a gun, because they "didn't know it was loaded!" Others sign important documents and then go to law, alleging that they "didn't know it was loaded!" Other persons read excellent scientific works and fail to derive benefit therefrom, or bad, false, pernicious books, and derive ruinous injury therefrom, because they do not read studiously, and "didn't know it was loaded!"

The readiest way to prevent progress and advancement, is to provide a code of laws, rules of action, and proclaim that they were established, or inspired, by a being, or personage, so perfect as to be beyond the sphere of progress. So long as, and to the degree that, those laws may be regarded as the standard of justice and right, so long, and to that degree, must the wheels of the car of progress be stopped, and the people must remain in the condition in which were those who wrote and established those laws.

So, also, the readiest way to make villains, meddlers, persecutors, and murderers of people, is to promulgate a code of unjust, ridiculous principles, rules, or criterions, and teach the people that they are to be regarded as being right, just, and proper, though not to be rigidly conformed to and observed, but are to be rescinded by contrary statutory laws, as are the precepts of Judaism and Christianity, which are abolished by our rational statutory laws in the United States. Such a people will contract the habit of violating those "sacred" laws, and from habit, will violate all other laws with impunity until caught. Such a people must hav many prisons well filled. About ten per cent of the people of the United States are Roman Catholics, and about fifty-five per cent of the state prisoners at Sing Sing, N. Y., are of that mother Christian sect. The greatest premium on crime ever invented! What an awful curse to humanity has been that "Holy Bible!"

To demonstrate that Christianity is barbarism, I will say that cause and effect, matter, time, and space are infinit. There never could hav been a first cause; there can never be a last one, nor an end to space or to time.

In Gen. i, 6-18, Bible, the "God" of the Jews and Christians, is said to hav placed the sun, moon, and stars under "the waters which were above the firmament." All priests and preachers, ere entering upon discussion, say, that "the waters above the firmament" is that which is held in the clouds, and in the form of invisible vapor, in the atmosphere of the earth. Afterward they try to squirm out of it.

Now, when we reflect upon the fact that the atmosphere of the earth is less than 100 miles high, that no atom of water could possibly ascend to the extreme upper limit thereof, that the moon is about 240,000 miles from us, that the sun is about 95,000,000 of miles away, and that the stars are millions of times farther off, and so far distant as to hav required 50,000 years for the light, at the velocity of 180,000 miles a second, to come from some of them to the earth, we readily see that he who wrote that fable, and claimed that it occurred about 6,000 years ago, must hav been inspired by a kind of John Jasper God, John Jasper being that old negro preacher down in Virginia, who says: "Dis eart am flat! De sun goes roun' dis wuld ebbery day! If dis wuld was roun', de folks on de under side 'd fall off! Dis eart am flat, kaze de Bible says 'tis!" As an old rich planter, Parson Shotwell, at Livingston, Tex., in 1861, said, "I don't say there is any justice in slavery; but God has commanded it in the Bible, and God knows what's right."

In Gen. i, 28, it says, "God" "blessed" "Adam and Eve" with such black ignorance that they knew not as to whether it was right or wrong to obey or to disobey him until after they had disobeyed, and had thus committed the awful sin of teaching the world a knowledge of right and wrong—"good and evil." And that "God" was omnipotent, and could hav done better! What malicious mischief!

To priests, preachers, popes, and "divine-right" kings, who burned the great libraries of the ancients to keep people in ignorance, it was very wicked for the people to dare to know right from wrong—"good from evil"—unless having been so instructed by a priest. Francis Joseph, emperor of Austria, said: "I do not want learned and scientific men; I want obedient subjects." (See "History of Napoleon Bonaparte," by Rev. J. S. C. Abbott, vol. ii, p. 303.)

Therefore, it was a great crime for "Adam and Eve" to teach humanity a knowledge of right and wrong, although they did not know good from evil when they did it; and because of having done so six thousand years ago, their innocent posterity, even of the present time, must writhe and frizzle in an everlasting hell as punishment therefor. What a malicious, "damnable" (2 Peter ii, 1) bill of attainder! In our Constitution of the United States, i., 9, 10, we hav rescinded that barbarism, by providing that "no bill of attainder shall be passed." Now, we'll hav to go to hell for that! Is it right to punish a person for a crime committed by another? He who believes that a just, decent, honest, omnipotent personage, would do it, must liv, and die, a villainous, wolfish creature! He who believes in Christianity, cannot know right from wrong. Society must be honey-combed with Beecher-Tiltons, Breckinridge-Pollards, Deacons, and Sickles, though not one in ten thousand of them is ever exposed. Hypocrisy begets hypocrits, as science produces scientists; and hypocrisy is the necessary shield of villainy.

I will now quote some of the mandatory holy statutes of the barbarous, omnipotent "God" of the Jews and Christians, every one of which we hav abolished, violated, and hav supplanted with decent, rational laws. Ex. xxi, 20, 21: "And if a man smites his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished; for he is his money." Just try it, Mr. Servant-holding Jew or Christian, if you dare! And remember that those were your omnipotent God's own words: Ex. xx, 1, 2. Also xxiii, 3: "Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause." We hav abolished that by a better law; and when bribed shysters, at the bar and on the bench, do not conspire, in our courts, against him, the poor man has a chance for justice.

Lev. xxv, 44-46: "Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt [not mayest] hav, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you; of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever." And xxiv, 22, shows that that also is the talk of the Jews and Christians' "God" himself. But we hav abolished it by the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments, and by that word "justice" in the preamble, of our Constitution, and of course we must go to hell for it!

In Num. xxxi, 17, 18, that omnipotent God, who could hav done better, commanded the Jews, saying: "Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him. But all the women children that hav not known man by lying with him keep alive for yourselves." Now, in an omnipotent "God," that was infamous, malicious mischief, to command those Jews to murder and rob all those Midianites; and then to thus keep alive, outrage, and torture their virgin daughters. No wonder his son told us to "judge not" (Matt. vii, 1; Luke vi, 37).

In Deut. xiii, 6-10, that omnipotent God established a law which provides that, if "the wife of thy bosom" differ with thee in religious matters, and if she try to induce thee to harmonize therein with her, thou shalt surely kill her. And in xiv, 21, "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself: thou shalt [not mayest] giv it unto the stranger that is in thy gates that he may eat it." We hav also abolished that by law.

In Matt. vi. 25, and Luke xii, 22, that omnipotent God commanded us to walk the streets naked, unless some one were to cast some kind of a garment upon us, in these words: "Take no thought for your body, what ye shall put on." In Luke xix, 27, he commanded us to murder people, in these words: "But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me." In strict obedience to that barbarous commandment, the mother Christian (Roman Catholic) church established that "Holy Christian Inquisition" in Spain; and everybody should read the history of that infamous barbarous, irresponsible institution. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Conceit of the Worms.

As the summer rain fell at the close of day,
Two angleworms met on their public highway,
And greeted each other as worms often do:
"I am happy," says one. "How is it with you?
Of richest bacilli I hav found a supply
That might feast all the world beside you and I;
And now when I'm thirsty here comes the sweet rain
To prevent dry bacilli from giving me pain.
Now to me it is plain that celestial care
Is over us worms wherever we are.
Evolution's false claim ne'er disgraces us,
Nor cell protoplasmic e'er prefaces us;
Our wriggle and crawl are marks of perfection,
While to walk on one's end is too silly to mention;
We hav delved deep in lore—hav tunneled the earth—
Hav roamed o'er its face and measured its girth.
Being fully convinced, I now dare affirm,
That all things that were made were made for the worm!"
"You reason profoundly," the other replies,
"And with me you'll agree that no worm ever dies;
We but undergo some mysterious change
That frees us from time and enlarges our range.
The care that preserves us night and day I am sure
Is a heavenly care that must ever endure!"
The hole in the ground and the hole in the sky
Contained, they were sure, all philosophy.
Thus wisely they communed till the early dawn—
Till a wise speckled hen was crossing the lawn—
Till that wise speckled hen stole up like a wizard
And quick put these worms inside of her gizzard!

What the Little Folks are Saying.

A little three-year-old girl, while her mother was trying to get her to sleep, became interested in some noise. She was told that it was caused by a cricket, when she sagely observed:

"Mamma, I think he ought to be oiled."

At the close of a long prayer by a father who had prayed for the poor, his son said: "Father, if I had as much wheat in the barn as you hav I would answer that prayer myself."

A little boy was asked what the Sunday-school text was. He answered, "Many are cold, but few are frozen."—Newark Call.

A teacher asked a bright little girl, "What country is opposit to us on the globe?" "Don't know," she answered. "Well, now," pursued the teacher, "if I were to bore a hole through the earth and you were to get in it at this end, where would you come out?" "Out of the hole, sir," replied the pupil, with an air of triumph.

Little Bess came home from church one Sunday with her head full of the sermon. It was about a "new heart," she told us, when we questioned her. Her father took her on his knee and gravely asked if she understood what a new heart is.

"Oh, yes indeed," she answered brightly, "it's a kind of heavenly stomach!"

"What relation is Mr. X—— to you?" asked the minister of a four-year-old boy.

"He's my grandpa."

"And what relation is Mrs. X——?"

"She's my grandma."

"And what relation am I to you?" added the clergyman.

The little fellow was puzzled, but was finally told: "I'm your pastor. You'll remember, won't you?"

The boy promised, and when he reached home electrified his mother and grandmother with the announcement: "Mr. Y—— says I'm some relation to him. He's my parsnip!"—Boston Herald.

Correspondence.

A KIND LETTER FROM A TRUE FRIEND.

OMAHA, NEB., July 29, 1894.

MISS S. H. WIXON. Dear Madam: I hav found sufficient time during this extremely hot weather to read your new book, entitled "Right Living." Its 292 pages are filled with beautiful precepts and moral maxims, and many examples are cited to show the beneficial effects of right living. The book is written in the interest of truth and morality, with a view to improving the condition of the human race, and is therefore a necessary and valuable contribution to moral literature. Personal duties are plainly and kindly outlined, showing that you are quite familiar with the wants and necessities of the times. When writing your book you hav criticised no creed, assailed no form of religious belief. It may therefore be read and appreciated by Jew or gentile, Catholic or Protestant, without doing any violence to the religious views of the reader. On page 19 we are told that "in living a moral life we should not be actuated by hope of reward or fear of punishment;" that "such reasons are both degrading and insulting;" that "we should do right because it is right and because such doing brings pleasurable feelings; not in order to be rewarded or for fear of punishment." Such teachings appear to me to be logical, reasonable, and moral. It cannot be moral to refrain from doing evil through fear of punishment or with a view of being rewarded. Morality should be practiced for its own sake alone. And when treating on the subject of temptation we read: "Temptations are all along the highway of life. Voices of tempters in musical tones proffering the cup of illicit pleasures meet one at almost every step." We are also reminded that happiness, which a virtuous life alone can produce, should not be sacrificed for the fleeting pleasures of the hour. Again: "Whatever temptations others fall into, we may never perhaps know how hard they tried to resist wrong nor from how much they did refrain." Burns wrote:

"Then gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler sister woman;
Though they may gang a kennin * wrang,
To step aside is human.
Then at the balance let's be mute,
We never can adjust it;
What's done we partly may compute,
But knaw not what's resisted."

Your new book may not immediately attain as wide a circulation as could be desired, but you know truth has always been in the minority and has had to struggle for an existence against overwhelming majorities; and there is a passage of scripture which says: "Cast thy bread upon the waters and it shall return unto thee after many days."

Progress and reform is the spirit of the present age. We may therefore entertain the hope that the time is not far distant when such books as "Right Living" will be in general demand and that truth will not always stand waiting at the gate while falsehood crowds the way.

"Right Living" is the fifth book, besides pamphlets, all the product of your own mind, which you hav laid before the public. You hav therefore already accomplished a considerable amount of mental labor. It may be said of you what Colonel Ingersoll said of Mr. Gladstone: "Your mind has been a harvest that has grown the more by reaping" (see Colonel Ingersoll's reply to Mr. Gladstone, North American Review, June, 1888). And when I say this you must not think I am resorting to flattery, because I and every one who has read your books well know that your intelligence is too great and your information too extensiv to be influenced in the least degree by flattery. Ignorance may appreciate flattery, but, in my opinion, intelligence invariably repudiates it.

R. S. C.

[Our friend will please accept our thanks for his kind and commendatory words. If all our friends were as appreciativ of our efforts as friend Colvin, "Right Living" would be in the hands of every Liberal in the world, and our publisher would be kept busy for some time to come. Modesty forbids the printing of the flattering words of our friend regarding our verses, but they are pleasant to remember. It is the kind expressions of our friends that giv us courage and strength to pursue our work regardless of all difficulties and barriers.—ED. C. C.]

*Little.

BENTONVILLE, ARK., June 26, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never written to THE TRUTH SEEKER, though my father has taken it for several years.

I havn't any girl friends that are Atheists, though I wish very much that I had. I hav read "Men, Women, and Gods," "Pray You, Sir, Whose Daughter?" and "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" by Helen H. Gardener, and like them very much. Father has more Freethought books that I intend to read.

I havn't any of your works, but wish that I had. I hav wanted "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" so much, but can't afford to send for it now.

I do not see how any one can believe that some one, or some spirit, is watching over us all the time, and seeing every act that we do. It seems to me I would be afraid of doing something wrong all the time. If there is a God, I can't see why he lets so many people suffer. Oh! I can't believe in one who is so cruel, and is supposed to hav power to do anything he desires.

I was sixteen last April, and I read the Bible every day (though I may not realize it), as you will see by the following: "I've a beautiful Bible I read every day when the weather is fine. The book is as broad as the sky and old as the world."

I read Mr. Genone's letter in the last TRUTH SEEKER, and will close this with the definition of how I interpret a God.

CLARA M. FRY.

PETERSBURG, IND., June 24, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Our school is out and I will write you and try for Mr. Genone's prize offer. The weather has been so warm and dry, growing crops almost perish, and wheat harvesters and their teams suffer. I am learning to propagate roses and grape vines, as June is the best time for doing so. Our Sunday-school teacher asked to-day how many of our class would be glad if Jesus were to come for the saved ones to-morrow? All held up hands but me. She asked me why I would not be glad, and I told her she shouldn't ask such questions, because it taught the pupils to tell lies; but if she had to ask such questions to ask them privately, for in church they were ashamed to tell the truth. I am not afraid of their den of lions or the serpentine tale swallowing attributes of Christianity. I hav read Mr. Genone's parable of a cow (Jersey) and other nice things in the Open Court, and like them. I think his statement that "The Christian myth is nearer the truth than any material fact," ignores, as did Jesus (?), a future personality, but recognizes as eternal "the enduring thoughts," "the characters we make for ourselves—and these inevitably survive in the effects they hav upon future lives" of others.

Your friend. ESTELLA WEAVER.

SKOWHEGAN, ME., Aug. 12. 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I wish to tell you of a four days' meeting held in Cornville, Me., a short time ago. Four supposed evangelists were engaged for the express purpose of gathering back to the fold a few who had gained a few ideas besides those their grandparents had, and who dared to express their views wherever they went. It has done the "backsliders" a great deal of good, but not quite in the way, perhaps, desired by the pious brothers and sisters. The principal evangelist told the people from the pulpit that the time to accept the Bible as an infallible book was past, and they all declared their belief in the ideas put forth by the apostate, and expressed their sympathy for them. To us, who were not interested, the result is rather amusing, as the gentlemen came from a distance and were quite liberally paid by the pious ones. One of the divines lectured on Spiritualism, and was an avowed Swedenborgian. One was a lecturer on the Socialistic question. I think there will be some deep thinking among some of them for a while. Yours truly,

LUCY BIGELOW.

BALLWIN, MO., Aug. 7. 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will tell you a story of a good church-member. I was visiting a little girl whose mother could not tell what became of all her tomatoes and cucumbers. The little girl, whose name is Pidgie, suspected a certain old darkey who lived close by, but her mother did not believe it, so we watched for him and saw him going down the road. Pidgie said, "Let's follow him and see where he goes." so we stole along on the other side of the fence until we got to the tomato patch, where we hid in some bushes and watched him. He had on a blouse which he unbuttoned as he went; then he went into the patch; he picked four large tomatoes and had his hand on another when Pidgie sang out "Hey there, what are you doing?" He gazed around, but did not answer. Pidgie repeated "What are you doing?" He came out and said "Oh, Miss Pidgie, I don't mean any harm, I's jist a tryin to ketch a few grass-hoppas to go a-fishin'! "Well, why don't you go into the field and catch grasshoppers?" "Oh, Miss Pidgie, I cain't ketch 'em out dere; dey's too friskey." Now, wasn't he a grand church-member? Well, I will close.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to liv. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

Gems of Thought.

WOMEN will find their place, and it will neither be that which they hav held, nor that to which some of them aspire. Nature's old Salic law will not be repealed, and no change of dynasty will be effected. —Professor Huxley.

IT may prove useful to hav learnt from history the elementary lesson that no opinion is true simply because it has been held by the greatest intellects, or by the largest number of human beings, at different periods in the history of the world.—Max Müller.

THE full earnings of 200,000 men at £2 per week each would not cover the cost of religion in England. And yet, with the sum of £20,000,000 spent to maintain a buttress for the privileged classes, people wonder that there should be poverty.—Uncle Benjamin, in Freethinker.

WE are too meek and lowly. Earth is cursed with charity and aches for justice. At every door is the hand extended. The stranger is not invited in. He is fed where he stands, and is counselled to pass on. Our social philanthropies are vagrancies. They despoil that they may shame us. They build high walls which cannot be scaled, and then withdraw the ladder or let it down only for select applicants.—Horace L. Traubel.

THIS one generation, with its vulgar steam-whistle, has witnessed the vanishing of more shadows from the earth, has seen more men and women disenthralled, more rays of intellectual light shed abroad upon mankind, than any ten generations which have preceded it; and ere it ceases that shrill signal shall swell to the trump of the last judgment, bringing to the bar of humanity every creed or institution of the earth.—Moncure D. Conway.

WE are expected to believe it [the miraculous birth of Jesus] as it occurs in a collection of writings becoming authorativ 360 years after the reported event. It matters not that there are two accounts of this birth, inconsistent with one another and with other scriptures, and both unsupported by any known or traceable witnesses, and that the facts are in subversion of the laws of nature and all human experience. The fiat of the church, given after this long interval, is to warrant their acceptance.—Judge Strange.

THE vast majority of men and almost all women in this age, as in every age, can hardly be said to think at all upon religion, or on any grave and serious subject. They believe what they hav been taught, and hold what they hear asserted, with indolent or unintelligent acquiescence; either because they are too careless and indifferent to trouble themselvs, or because they care so much that it seems to them profane to question the soundness of that which is the life of their soul, the stay of the better part of their nature; and thus they make the importance of a truth the evidence upon which they accept it.—Lord Chief Justice Coleridge.

WHAT knowledge is of most worth?—the uniform reply is—Science. This is the verdict on all counts. For direct self-preservation, or the maintenance of life and health, the all-important knowledge is—Science. For that indirect self-preservation, which we call gaining a livelihood, the knowledge of greatest value is—Science. For the due discharge of parental functions, the proper guidance is to be found only in—Science. For that interpretation of national life, past and present, without which the citizen cannot rightly regulate his conduct, the indispensible key is—Science. Alike for the most perfect production and present enjoyment of art in all its forms, the needful preparation is still—Science; and for the purposes of discipline—intellectual, moral, religious—the most efficient study is, once more, Science.—Herbert Spencer.

EVEN the ascetic and the Cavinist are themselvs, though they know it not, "faddling hedonists." The difference is merely that they base their hedonism on a mistaken hypothesis. They make a caculus of the caprices of their Setebos. Believing in a malignant and maleficent diety, who has set forth a cruel and difficult plan of salvation, they hold that the wisest course for that worm called man is to put up with infinit pains and penalties here—and why? Simply in order that he may be happy with palm and crown in some imagined future existence. He is to swing with hooks through his back at an Indian festival; he is to cast himself beneath the wheels of the car of Juggernaut; he is to scourge himself with thongs and wear the hair-shirt of penance in a Spanish monastery; he is to lead the loneless, joyless life of prayer-meetings and chapel-going with the "respectable" English Dissenting grocer—for what? Why, to curry favor in heaven and be happy hereafter.—Grant Allen.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

By Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B.

CONTENTS:

BOOK I.—PLEASURE: Chap. I.—Sources of Pleasure. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures. Chap IV.—Social Pleasures. Chap. V.—Pleasures of the Savage, the Barbarian and the Civilized. Chap. VI.—Genesis of religions. Chap. VII.—Christianity.

BOOK II.—INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Purpose of life. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures: Knowledge. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Reason. Chap.—V. Ideal Pleasures: Character. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Pedagogical Despotism.

BOOK III.—MORAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Morality. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures: Prudence. Chap. III.—Material Pleasures: Refinement. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Foresight, Chap. V.—Ideal Pleasures: Civilization. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Vice Caused by Restraint.

BOOK IV.—SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Progress. Chap. II.—Protection, Capitalism, and Socialism: Respectivly an Actual, an Imminent, and a Proposed Violation of Individual Sovereignty. Chap. III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism. Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject without much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress?—by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for its bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

Pleasure and Progress" has 398 pages, is splendidly printed from large, clear type, on excellent paper, and costs, bound in cloth, $1; paper covers, 50 cents.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

RESURRECTION OF JESUS. An Agnostic's View. By Don Allen. New York: The Truth Seeker Co. Price 50 cents.

This is a little book of 160 pages, devoted mainly to proving by authoritativ statement and circumstantial evidence that no such thing as the resurrection of the physical body of Christ ever took place. The belief of professing Christians in immortality has for centuries been based on this claim, and the author of this book, after demolishing this mythical story, reaches the conclusion that we hav no knowledge of a future life. If he had devoted one-half of the time and labor spent in producing the book to an honest and careful investigation of the phenomena of Spiritualism he might hav come to a different conclusion. The misfortune of the work is, that while destroying the theological evidence of a future life it has nothing better to offer in its stead.—Banner of Light.

FACTS AND FICTIONS OF LIFE. By Helen H. Gardener. For sale by the Truth Seeker Company.

Miss Gardener is a daring thinker and a bold and forcible writer. In this volume of essays she speaks in no uncertain tones. She has radical views about social matters—about the true relations of the sexes, about conventional morality, and about the duties of men and the rights of women. These views she expresses fearlessly and with perfect taste. Such a subject as one of these essays, "Heredity in Its Relations to a Double Standard of Morals," might easily hav been made offensiv by one of those "strong-minded females" of whom we hav heard, but Miss Gardener can offend none but a "prurient prude" by her treatment of the burning question which she discusses. While we cannot agree with everything that Miss Gardener says in these essays, we recognize the fact that we hav in her book a modest, pure, and fearless woman speaking her mind upon points on which she has a right to be heard, and we welcome the volume accordingly.—Charleston (S. C.) Sunday News.

SKY-PILOT: "I can never credit that we are descended from monkeys." Miss Smart (after looking him over): "I can."

THE Sunday-school class was singing, "I Want to be an Angel" "Why don't you sing louder, Bobby?" asked the teacher. "I'm singing as loud as I want to be an angel," explained Bobby.

A CITIZEN of Montreal lately on a visit to Ottawa, while passing down the hotel corridor to his room at a late hour, happened to hear violent groans and sobs issuing from one of the rooms. As the door was open, he entered and recognized a fellow Montrealer, prominent in political and business circles, and famous for his religious and alcoholic tendencies. He was kneeling at his bedside, clinging to the side of the bed, and sobbing as though his heart would break. "What's the matter, old man?" inquired our friend, touching the sufferer on the shoulder. "I'm so damned drunk I can't say my prayers," was the tearful response.—Life.

THE chief of the Leslies is said to hav prayed before a battle: "Be on our side! And gin ye canna be on our side, aye lay low a bit, an ye'll see thae carles get a hidin that must please ye." An old Covenanter, who ruled his household with a rod of ir n, is said to hav prayed in all sincerity, at family worship: "O Lord, hae a care o' Rob, for he is on the great deep, an thou holdest it in the hollow o' my hand. An hae a care o' Jamie, for he has gone to fight the enemies o' his country, an the outcome o' the battle is wi' thee. But ye need na fash o' yersel' wi' wee Willy, for I hae him here, and I'm cawpable o' looking after him mysel'."—San Francisco Argonaut.

IN a Scottish farmhouse I hav, with the candles out, knelt with the family and servants at "family worship," and heard the farmer bring into his "sooplication" a certain stirk that was ill with "reidwater," and then launch into matters which I doubt if any deity that was ever on Olympus could understand, far less answer. On one farm of not more than one hundred acres in all, I hav heard the Lord requested to send at least two different kinds of weather at the same time—dry weather to dry the "stooks" of corn, and rain for the good of the turnips. The corn was in the one field and the turnips were in the other; and there was only a broken down stone dyke between them. The Lord was, this time, asked to perform a feat which he declined to hav anything to do with, and which, as far as I am aware, no deity has yet accomplished. All things are, of course, possible with the Lord; but there are certain things he refuses to do lest he should make a fool of himself!—Saladin.

ANTHONY, CENSOR.

O Anthony, Saint Anthony, the world is very evil,
And this generation calls on you to act your saintly part;
To fight the good fight valiantly and exorcise the devil
Of lubricity from history and literature and art.

The books, the books, my Anthony, that you will hav to wade through!
Will you start off with the classics as about the first and worst?
Anacreon and Ovid, here Bohn's libraries will aid you,
Aristophanes and Sophocles, and other works accurst.

Then the wicked, wicked pages of the medieval ages,
Their mysteries and histories, their poems and romance;
The infamy of alchemy, the sophistry of sages,
And above all, O Saint Anthony, the ribaldry of France.

Books too numerous to mention need immediate attention;
Very wicked, sinful things are read and written in these days.
Shakspere must not be forgotten, his Lucrece is simply rotten,
And you'll hav a perfect picnic when you expurgate his plays.

Do not leave a single reader of the wickedness of Ouida,
Frown, oh, frown on Tess's, Dodo's, and The Yellow Aster's sin.
Don't let Harper finish Trilby, you cannot tell bow bad she will be,
And stop the sale at once of Sarah Graud's unearthly Twins.

The list is long and life is short, O Anthony Censorious.
You cannot read them through, but there is one thing you can do,
Put all books in one glorious index expurgatorius
Until each one is scrutinized and authorized by you.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. CHEAP EDITION.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth, 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Priestly Celibacy Exposed. A lecture by the Rev. Geo. Townsend Fox, of Durham, England. Revised American edition, showing the result in parishes of the Roman decree that priests shall not mary. Price, paper, 15 cents.

Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures Respecting New Hall Convent, Boreham, Essex, England. Showing that convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom. Price, paper, 10 cents.

THE GREAT CHAMPION OF LIBERTY—THOMAS PAINE.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies nearly all adjourned, but the people of the country remained in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to o, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the fund and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

Speaking of the infinit depths of space, and referring to the fact that light travels at the rate of 180,000 miles a second, an exchange piously but indiscreetly observes:

"If the glad tidings of that first Christmas in Bethlehem, nineteen centuries ago, had thus been disseminated through the universe, there are yet stars of which astronomers could tell us, plunged into space in depths so appalling that even the 1894 years which hav elapsed since that event would not hav been long enough for the news to reach them."

But where do you find the "glad tidings" in that alleged event at Bethlehem for the inhabitants, if any, of those distant orbs? Think of the souls that hav been launched into hell in these eighteen hundred and ninety-four years that the "glad tidings" of a murdered God hav been on the way to them. Is this earth, this tiny dot in the immensity of the universe, the only world which has been honored by the opportunity to kill a son of God? It must be so, for we are informed that the Jewish mystic was his only male offspring.

The Annual Congress and Church Aggressions.

There can be no room for doubt that there is plenty of work for a national organization of Freethinkers. Yes, for two organizations, if all cannot work together harmoniously in one society. The annual conventions are worth all they cost, if we reckon on the credit side only the enthusiasm and comradeship that they create or revivify. But they do much more than this, for attention is thus attracted to our principles, and antagonism to the evils we oppose is aroused where before was only ignorance of or indifference to them. This consideration induces the suggestion that the first work of the first day of a Freethought convention should be the appointment of a press committee, whose duty it shall be to supply the reporters of the local dailies and the agents of the press associations with accurate documentary and other information concerning the society, its principles and purposes, and the church aggressions which threaten to or hav already alieniated the religious and civil liberty of the citizen. Such a committee of influential men and women could do much to secure for us fair treatment in the public journals. We must reach the masses of the people who do not take Liberal papers. Ten lines of correct information are worth more to the cause than columns of the ordinary reporter's space-filling guess-work or misrepresentation.

The national organization should also prepare itself for defensiv work in the courts, in state legislatures, and in Congress—and not only for defensiv work but for offensiv work where theocratic statutes hav already been enacted. The secularizati on of the state must for a long time remain the central object of a national organization of Liberals. That is, in other words, its work will be mainly political. Its primary purpose is not to propagate Atheism, Infidelity, evolutionary science, or any other specifically anti-orthodox doctrin, ism or theory. Individual iconoclasts, scholars, and scientists are doing that work just as effectually as they can under present political and social conditions. THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing that in great shape—doing it fast and well. The mission of the National Society is to broaden the domain of even-handed justice, to secure for men and women of all shades of religious belief or non-belief the full equality in liberty to which they are entitled under the Constitution. All partial, proscriptiv, theocratic laws must go; so long as one such remains on our statute books, this is not a land of religious freedom. The national organization should enable the Freethinkers of the United States to concentrate their forces in defense of the points attacked by the foes of secular institutions or to mobilize them for the siege of strongholds now held by those enemies. We ought to hav an organization so alert and so well equipped that it can act at once. If, for instance, the dailies report that in a town in Connecticut or Georgia an attempt is being made to enforce the Sunday statutes, the secretary of the Secular Union should mail, on that day, to every name mentioned in connection with the persecutions, anti-Sunday-law leaflets and pamphlets, and should, whenever possible, put himself into direct communication with some live Freethinker in that town. Every such puritan crusade givs us the best of opportunities to sow seed in quickening soil. Take advantage of it. If a legal fight is made, so much the better; public interest will be kept awake that much the longer.

In addition to the distribution of literature of the right kind, we should be prepared to furnish the best legal advice to the attorneys for the defense, and also to financially strengthen the hands of the local defense committee when necessary. We must be ready to go into all legislative bodies to combat the schemes of the theocrats and to prevent the defeat of bills for the taxation of church property, the eliminaton of religious instruction from the common schools, and the repeal of Sunday laws. We should have permanent headquarters at Washington and at every state capitol. The champions of the union of church and state are splendidly prepared for fight; they are organized locally, by districts and states, and nationally. They have many kinds of societies, all working, among different classes and through every available channel, to the same end. Within the last few years they hav won scores of victories that would never have been theirs if we had been as zealous and intelligently active in defense of our rights as they hav been in warfare against those rights. In this world we hav to work or fight for all that is worth anything, scarcely excepting fresh air and sunlight. The church has granted mankind no liberties which she could withhold when she thought the withholding would be of benefit to herself.

It is cheering to see that the officers of the Freethought Federation are awake to the encroachments of the church party. As they mention the Sunday issue in their call for the annual congress, we give below, in brief, a partial list of the outrages committed, attempted, or contemplated by the Sundayites during the last few weeks, as they hav been recorded in the reactionary organs or the daily papers.

The Sabbath Union calls for activ work on the part of Sabbath committees in twenty states against Sunday base ball; in some states more severe laws are demanded, and it is declared that a Sunday League, "as in the case of the Divorce Reform League," can "secure uniform Sunday legislation in the several states." This suggests the necessity for a "Free Sunday League," to render nugatory the work of the proposed "Sunday League," as well as to bring to naught the schemes of existing Sabbatarian societies.

A reverend correspondent of the American Sabbath suggests more meddling with the schools. He says:

"If the correspondence from our colleges were dated other than on Sunday, it would giv us another bit of influence."

No doubt. Perhaps they will be able to get that "bit of influence" if the Covenanter committee appointed for the purpose of cajoling or frightening school book publishers into the preparation of text-books permeated with arguments for a puritan, law-guarded Sunday, succeeds in its designs. That is a plot we must watch very closely.

Mary A Woodbridge, corresponding secretary of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, in answer to the question, "What practical method would you suggest to counteract the influence of the Sunday secular newspaper," writes:

"I cannot conceive an equivalent counteracting influence, and pray only for the enduement of power."

By this she means the attainment of legal power by the church, as the context of her letter shows. Rev. J. P. Sankey says:

"If we can only get public sentiment right on this question, the lawmakers will soon suppress the evil of Sunday secular newspapers."

That is, if a majority can be secured against Sunday papers, they will be prohibited, regardless of the rights of the minority.

In Canada an order of council forbids the opening of the canals on Sunday, and the lower house of the Canadian Parliament has passed a Sunday law, without protest save from THE TRUTH SEEKER and American Sentinel. A Christian amendment to the national Constitution and two Sunday bills slumber in the committee rooms of Congress. They may be awakened at any time when the national legislature meets again. One of these bills forbids Sunday mails and interstate commerce on Sunday.

Stores closed in Merrill, Wisconsin, when a Christian mayor was elected. All churches join for persecution, as at Steven's Point, Wisconsin, where, at a Sunday closing mass-meeting, speeches were made by a Catholic priest, the prosecuting attorney, a physician, and a Baptist minister. At Pittsburg information was made against twelve fruit dealers for selling on Sunday. Speaking of the large number of people who visit Schenley Park, Pittsburg, on Sunday, the Christian Reformer observes that they certainly need the advantages afforded by the parks, "but it is a great wrong done to their souls to use the Sabbath to obtain that advantage." Therefore, in order to save their souls for them, they must be compelled by law to keep out of the parks on Sunday! Did the Inquisition ever do more than persecute men and women by law for their souls' health?

The Sundayites will not play fair, and, indeed, you could not expect fairness from people who are determined to load the dice of their opinions with the lead of legal statutes. Here, at this late day, after the fradulent means by which the so-called petitions for the closing of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday hav been a thousand times exposed, comes the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, North, ("of God," as a Disciple friend of ours was in the habit of saying), and gravely asserts in formal resolutions that the "large majority of our American people" expressed their convictions against Sunday opening of the Fair. Think of that! Do not these gentlemen know that they hav been forbidden to bear false witness?

To resume the enumeration of aggressions: W. B. Capps, an Adventist, of Weakley county, Tennessee, is serving a long term in jail, working out a fine and costs at twenty-five cents a day, for plowing in his field on Sunday. Adventists are threatened with mobbing in North Carolina and Maryland. The antagonism grows out of their attitude on Sunday question. Sunday "sacred" concerts were started at Riverview Park, Allegheney, Pennsylvania. Immense numbers attended. The Presbyterians raised a disturbance, the movers of the enterprise were intimidated, and the concerts ceased. Members of Harrisburg base-ball club were fined four dollars each and costs for Sunday playing. At Cambridge, Massachusetts, an attempt was made to close drug stores on Sunday. It failed through the strained interpretation of the law by a judge. But the law has not been repealed. Another judge can decide against Sunday opening. The Chicago common council passed an ordinance closing certain classes of business houses on Sunday. Mayor Hopkins vetoed the ordinance. The margin of victory was very small.

"United action on the part of the churches" stopped Sunday base-ball at the East End, Dayton, Ohio. Seventeen players were fined ten dollars each and costs. Business houses closed at Eaton and Marinette, Wisconsin. The Ministerial Association of Muncie, Indiana, interfered with Sunday trade, and most of the shopkeepers "heeded the warning." Sunday free bus line interdicted at Toronto, Canada. The religious press of Baltimore protests "against the rapid increase of Sunday resorts," due to the electric roads. Once more science wounds superstition and helps the people. In many states, especially Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, the Sunday closing propaganda is being pushed with extreme vigor. At Johnstown, Pennsylvania, the police authorities hav forbidden the newsboys crying Sunday papers.

The New York Sabbath Association has just issued a lengthy pronunciamento. It seeks to secure such a Sunday law as will stop all Sunday business, including the sale of fruits, confectionery, and newspapers, and will stop Sunday excursions. This shows plainly that its objects are nefarious and might well be called criminal. Sunday traveling facilities should be vastly increased, for the mental, physical, and moral good of the people. In Chicago a strong legal fight is being made against Sunday ball playing. At New Canaan, Connecticut, a crusade against Sunday trade and recreation has been inaugurated. Several arrests hav been made and fines imposed. It is reported that a compromise will be effected, permitting open doors until 10 A.M. This would not satisfy the restaurants and liverymen. It is a conflict in which there may be an occasional lull, but no permanent settlement until the secular principle is frankly and fully accepted or the church returns to complete power.

In Europe the Sunday worshipers are gaining some points. The Puritan idea is influencing the continent as the continental idea has acted upon opinion and law in England and the United States. The contending forces are at present vibrating toward equilibrium.

We have mentioned but a few of the outrages committed during the last three months by the Sunday meddlers and their tools There hav been also several decisions rendered recently by state supreme courts which hav been wholly favorable to the theocrats. We must do all we can to educate the people and to thwart the purposes of the Covenanter politicians. We fight from the vantage ground of the Constitution. We stand for equal freedom. We demand impartial justice.

Freethought Does Not Sanction Persecution.

We had until very recently supposed that no Atheist, least of all the editor of an Atheist paper, would dispute the validity of the truism at the head of this article. But the Ironclad Age has given us a revelation. It seems that there is occasionally to be found an Atheist who denies the right of freedom of thought and expression on religious subjects. It is unexplainable why all Atheists are not Freethinkers and Liberals.

Some weeks ago the Ironclad Age said:

"We trust that the time will come when the cheerful doctrin of eternal torture will no longer be bellowed forth at camp-meetings and other godly assemblages by insane sensational rascals. We trust that the time will come when such work will be interdicted by law."

The American Sentinel sharply criticised the last sentence of the foregoing paragraph, and we heartily indorsed the Sentinel's condemnation thereof. Now comes the Ironclad Age with the assurance that it had passed by the American Sentinel's criticisms "as unworthy of notice." Then it adds:

"Referring to the 'second paragraph,' [the one just quoted], what is wrong with it except from a Christian standpoint? Even a dago knows that perjury is a crime. Is it not also as much of a crime to teach falsehood as to utter it? Is the crime lessened by the 'so help me God that makes a lie the truth?' If it is a crime to lie and to teach a lie, why should it not be interdicted by law?"

Perhaps it is a waste of time and space to cross words with one who cannot distinguish between the crime of perjury and the propagation of erroneous opinions, but the fair name of Freethought cannot be permitted to be smirched in this abominable way. There is nothing wrong with "the second paragraph" from the the Christian standpoint, if for camp-meetings you substitute Freethought propaganda, but everything is wrong with it from the Liberal standpoint. Freethought is nothing if not a protest against the interdiction of opinion by law. It is little that the church has taught falsehoods; with men's brains, and tongues, and pens left free, the false must hav yielded place to the true. But it is much that the church has forced her creeds—it does not matter greatly whether they were true or false—upon the world by sword and flame. It was the propaganda by force of arms, by proscription and torture, that was the curse. That it was that for centuries destroyed the keenest intellects and noblest hearts of Christendom. That is why we hate or fear the church, as our temperaments may be. Had the church done nothing more than peacefully teach false doctrins, we could to-day, in the light of greater knowledge, well afford to smile at her delusions and indulgently study her legends, without bitterness of soul or tears of anguish for the terrible past. But she persecuted and she would persecute to-day if she had the power. More—she does persecute, and that is why Freethought is militant instead of being purely scholarly and scientific. We organize to defend ourselvs, not against the teaching of untruths, but against the forcing of religious dogmas down our throats by law. Whether these dogmas are true or untrue is immaterial, in so far as the question of making them a part of the civil law is concerned. They are matters for individual choice or rejection, not for forcing on the minority by injunctions, indictments, and bayonets.

If, then, the church is loathed by us because she has "interdicted by law" what she called "lies," why should we invite the execration of the future by interdicting by law what we call "lies." The proposition is monstrous and the attempt to actualize it would be suicidal.

Of course all Freethinkers are opposed to the compulsory judicial oath. That is not the issue. If a witness perjures himself, he wrongs the man in the dock or society, if it is a case of alleged crime, or the defendent or plaintiff, if it is a civil case. There is no analogy between his act and that of the preacher. They are not in the same category. This should need no argument.

"If it is a crime to lie and to teach a lie, why should it not be interdicted by law?" asks the Ironclad Age. That is the question asked, mentally or aloud, by every man who has tortured his fellows for difference of opinion, in every age of the world. It appears impossible to get the virus of intolerance out of the blood of the race. Still it would seem that even the most bigoted could easily see that if the principle is once admitted that it is justifiahle to punish one man for giving utterance to that which two other men hold to be false doctrins in religion, the way is opened for the persecution and extermination of every minority by every majority. It is all a question of interpretation and power. Each is sure to maintain that he has the truth and that the gospel of his opponent is a "lie." There can be no safety if the law is permitted to meddle in the least. This is what is meant by separation of church and state. This is the Freethought position. This is Secularism. To play false to or be lukewarm in defense of this fundamental principle underlying all orderly, peaceful, and fraternal human society is to open Pandora's box. Even many Italians know this, and one of the noblest of them died at the stake, a victim to the opposing principle. It does not hurt him now to call him a "dago," but those who subjected him to the agony of death by fire accepted and put into practice the identical principle of proscription for opinion's sake that is now hotly advocated by one who flings at his countrymen this belittling epithet. They who murdered Bruno had far more excuse for thinking that suppression of alleged falsehoods was permissible and even highly praiseworthy than hav those who enjoy the advantage of living in this age of comparativ enlightenment and gentleness.

Criticising the sentence that we hav been criticising, the American Sentinel asked: "What right has the Ironclad Age to find fault that a witness is required to avow his belief in God before being permitted to testify?" The question was entirely legitimate in view of the position taken by the Ironclad Age that revivals should be prohibited by law. This led us to say: "The American Sentinel is perfectly right in its criticism of the Ironclad Age." Now the latter paper quotes both of these averments and proceeds to lash the two New York papers for defending the judge who would not let a witness testify unless he would assert his belief in a God! Of course all intelligent readers of all three of these journals knew that we had not the most remote intention of defending a religious test in any court of justice. It was perfectly plain that we were endeavoring to show how inconsistent and absurd it was for the Ironclad Age to denounce the Christian judge who required a profession of Theism from the intending witness, while it was itself demanding the suppression of religious revivals.

It is not necessary for us to deny the truth of the Indianapolis paper's assertion that this journal is not an upholder of the Atheistic position. Our attitude is too well known, and our arguments against Theism are too familiar to our readers to call for a categorical disclaimer of the ridiculous charge. If to "cautiously trot round on the outskirts of Infidelity" is fairly descriptiv of a firm, consistent, and earnest defense of the essentials of Freethought, then we cheerfully plead guilty. We will continue to patrol the picket lines and pick up stragglers and guerrillas and send them back into camp to be put through a course of drilling in Freethought tactics.

A Prophet Come to Judgment.

Animadverting upon the case of J. B. Wise, the Atlanta Constitution says:

"It strikes us that when a man with evil intentions makes improper use of a portion of the Scriptures in a manner that is calculated to injure public morals he commits a crime and should be punished."

That would induce mirth in a granit boulder. Note the gratuitous assumptions: It is taken for granted that Mr. Wise was actuated by evil intentions when he sent the quotation from the Bible to Rev. Mr. Vennum, that he made improper use of a portion of Scripture, and in a manner calculated to injure public morals! How does the Constitution know that Mr. Wise had evil intentions when he called Mr. Vennum's attention to a passage in the Bible? Is it a matter of course that a man is desperately depraved when he points out contradictions or other imperfections in that volume? And in asking the minister to explain, if he could, the presence of that particular passage in a book alleged to teach nothing but the purest morals, how did Mr. Wise make improper use of a portion of the scriptures? Is it not permissible to request the "authorized" expounders of the Bible to explain and harmonize its contents? What is their mission, anyway, if it does not include the doing of such work? The richest morceau, however, of the Constitution's intellectual dainties is found in its assertion that the sending of the card was "calculated to injure public morals"! Whose "public" morals? Rev. H. B. Vennum's? Is it to be presumed that the Bible is so vile and so terribly dangerous in its influence that when a minister reads a copy of one of its off-color passages he is in imminent peril of going to the bad and making a public exhibition of his private morals? It seems to us that the Constitution is unnecessarily severe on both the book and the minister, and anyway, probably Mr. Vennum had read the text before. How could he know that the Bible is all God's word if he had not read it all? Once more the Atlanta paper:

"He [Mr. Wise] should not be permitted to shield himself behind the plea that he was merely quoting from the Bible. The man who deliberately picks out single sentences from the Bible that will suggest impure thoughts and then makes them public, is an enemy to society, morality, and religion. There should be a heavy penalty for such offenders, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Wise will not escape."

Just think of that! The Bible "suggest impure thoughts"? And it is a thick-and-thin Christian who makes the charge! Nothing could be more discouraging to the humble worker in the vineyard of the Lord. Would it not be a good plan to get out an expurgated edition of the work, and then burn all copies of the old editions? If that were done Mr. Wise's guns would be spiked; he could not again so easily make himself "an enemy to society, morality, and religion." Just imagin, if you can, the spectacle the Freethinker would present who should denounce a Christian for copying a "single" paragraph from the "Age of Reason," or from one of Ingersoll's lectures, and mailing it to a representativ of organized Freethought. Suppose the Freethinker should call that Christian "an enemy to society, morality, and religion," and should demand a "heavy penalty for such offenders"—what would the Constitution say? It would most likely assert that the Freethinker was tyrannical as well as hysterical, or that the Liberal book needed revision, if not more severe treatment.

It happens that Mr. Wise did not make "public" this tabooed quotation from the Bible. Mr. Vennum has done that. Before the echoes of this persecution hav died away tens of thousands of Christians will hav taken down their Bibles or borrowed copies and looked up the passage. On Mr. Vennum's shoulders will rest and on his conscience should rest all the responsibility. If he had not been so eager to revenge himself upon the heretic, nothing of this would hav occurred.

The Constitution objects to having certain parts of the Bible read without their context, the implication being that read in connection with the context they are harmless. Probably this plea is put in to save the book in its entirety from prosecution under the law against obscene literature. But most of the judges who hav presided at the trials of men arrested under that law for transmitting through the mails works on social reform and physiology, hav held that so long as the indicted passages remained therein, the pamphlets and papers which were prosecuted must be shut out of the mails. That ruling would keep the Bible out of the mail sacks, for the Constitution admits that parts of it are so bad that the man who makes them public outside of the Bible itself is "an enemy to society, morality, and religion."

"No good citizen—no Christian—ever hunted up certain peculiar passages in the Old Testament and published them without their context. This should be the test."

It is no doubt true that no partisan of the Bible, no Christian, ever made much public use of these "certain peculiar passages," for to do so would hav been highly impolitic, but many of the best men and women who hav lived hav insisted on calling the attention of the Christian world to them and to other unsavory parts of that book, and so effectiv has been their work that the Old Testament has largely ceased to be appealed to by even the most devout believers as a standard of morals and justice. It is now realized that the work is human in its origin, and has very many of the imperfections that characterize all the works of man.

Among the latest hair-lifting canards of the "patriots" is the report, duly scare-headed, that "the general cause of hard times is due to the action of Roman Catholic capitalists in the United States," who are working "in secret" to impoverish America and enrich Rome. This is the real cause and meaning of the investment of English capital in the United States, we are gravely told. And there are numbers of people, generally esteemed of fair intelligence, who giv generous hospitality to these tales, and so help make the cause of genuin secularization ridiculous, and inevitably strengthen Rome by the circulation of charges which excite only the derision of thoughtful conservativs and progressists.

Attention is called to the statistics of property exempt from taxation in the state of New York. By the United States census of 1890 there was at that time a total of $140,123,008 of church property in this state. According to the report of Comptroller Roberts the churches, parsonages, and cemeteries exempted from taxation are valued at $134,761,444. The factor of cemetaries makes it uncertain how nearly these two aggregates represent the same property. Then we find that $53,987,184 worth of charitable and reformatory institutions is also exempt. Many of these institutions, and the most wealthy, are sectarian. Referring to church cemetaries, the property holders near one of the recently laid out parks in the upper part of the city are complaining because Trinity Corporation has thrown all the burden of the additional tax levy on them.

The Freethought Letter Writing Corps will this week direct its attention to the New York World. That paper is now trying to arouse public interest in the Sunday question. It points out the need for much better and more entensiv facilities for recreation and instruction on Sunday. It demands more parks and fewer meddling laws. It shows how difficult it is for the greater number of the poorer people in the larger cities to enjoy themselvs in a healthful and non-invasiv manner on the first day of the week. Help the World in this fight for a happy and useful Sunday for the people by writing short letters explanatory of the fundamental principles that we hold The World has an immense circulation, and this is a splendid opportunity for us to reach hundreds of thousands of readers who never see a distinctivly Freethought paper.

Mr. Samuel P. Putnam is now working up the annual congress of the Liberals. The combined convention of the Freethought Federation and the American Secular Union will doubtless be a very enjoyable affair and should be productiv o much good to the cause of equal justice. There is a great deal of "magnetism" in Mr. Putnam, and although he has heavily charged "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" with it, there is no doubt that he has enough left to kindle enthusiasm at Chicago in October. Work on "Four Hundred Years" is progressing as rapidly as possible under the circumstances, and we hope to be able soon to announce its completion. The book and THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year are still entered for $6,50, in advance, and the subscriber's name goes into the book as that of one of the original patrons. The book alone costs $5, with the same privileges. We hav received the following additional names since the last acknowledgment was made: Texas—A. Ockander; New York—James J. Mills; Massachusetts—A. W. Sturdy; West Virginia—John R. Selbe.

Rev. T. P. Stevenson is one of the leaders of the National Reform Association. He is special secretary for marriage and divorce laws. In answer to the criticism that it is not properly a part of that Association's work to seek the "reform" of such laws, he says in the Christian Reformer:

"Its [the Association's] work for the Sabbath, for the Bible in the schools, and every other of its special departments rests on its central principle of the paramount authority of Christ over man in all relations, and the supremacy of his moral laws. The discussion of our marriage and divorce laws necessitates the presenting of the claims of Christ as the nation's Lord and King, and of the guilt and danger of the nation which enacts laws in defiance of his authority."

People of progressiv, scientific tendencies will perceive that there is something very superstitious and delusiv in the orthodox cry for the revolution of our laws of marriage and divorce. With the theocrats it is not a question of human needs, but of asserted godly commands. Because a man said to hav lived about two thousand years ago is declared to hav made certain statements regarding the relations of the sexes, we of to-day must accept as infallibly true and unquestionably authoritativ those traditional utterances and conform all our laws and social relations to their letter and spirit, regardless of all experience militating against the wisdom of those ancient averments and oblivious to all the light of the present. "Christ" is our "King" and we must submit, no matter what the cost. This is one of the slaveries which the success of the theocrats would fasten upon us.

In the course of an argument in favor of the proposition to issue series of text-books for the public schools, which shall contain a certain—probably a quite large—amount of matter in support of the extreme theocratic conception of a Sabbath, the Christian Reformer givs to the world this remarkable syllogism:

"The state is under obligation to teach what is necessary for its own welfare. The Sabbath is essential to the welfare of the state. It follows, therefore, that the state should teach the duty of Sabbath observance in the schools."

Assuming that the paper means that the state should in the public schools teach the duty of Sabbath observance, it is proper to remark that the minor premise has yet to be established. It is not proven that the universal observance of a particular day by voluntary abstention from all work and recreation is essential to the welfare of a state, that is, of course, of the people. (Even the Spanish Inquisition might be necessary to the welfare of a despotic government—such, to illustrate, as that which the National Reform Association is moving heaven and earth to establish.) Still less has it been demonstrated that a compulsorily observed universal Sabbath of idleness, gloom, and fear-born religious pretensions is essential to the welfare of the citizens of any state. But if it were true that a law-compelled universal "rest day" were necessary to the perpetuation of a given government, such fact would be prima facie evidence that that government was not worth perpetuating.

Communications.

A Lesson for Mr. Hays,

It is far better to think without talking, than it is to talk without thinking.

A man who cannot reason cannot be convinced by reason.

A man who can talk without advancing an argument, is incapable of appreciating an argument.

A man who never studies but one side of a question is the most positiv man in the world.

Galileo taught the rotundity and revolution of the earth and the central position of the sun. He was brought before the inquisitors on a charge of heresy. No man of his time was more capable of explaining the solar theory than he. To the inquisitors the old Ptolemaic theory must be right, therefore the Copernican system must be wrong. It was one of thousand cases where prejudice and ignorance triumph over reason.

A man who was digging a well said to his boy, "That schoolmaster may be a great man, but when he talks about the world 'turnin'' over, I don't want you to pay any attention to his nonsense. I left the pick and shovel and crow-bar in the well, and if the world turns over 'them' tools won't be in the well in the 'mornin',' they'll all slide out."

Perhaps it would be better to leave such men to the slow process of evolution than to try to convince them of error.

It is claimed that a tariff enriches a country and gives the working man better wages. Then it must follow that to lower the tariff would tend to impoverish the country and reduce wages. And to abolish it entirely would bring utter ruin upon the country and make the wage earner work for nothing. If this be true, then the tariff could be raised high enough to make the country rich beyond all parallel in a short time, and to give to the wage earner such a high price for his labor that he could retire in a few years.

Why don't these high tariff men all emigrate to Mexico. They would find a very paradise of protection there. There is a tariff wall built around the entire country, and also around each state and municipality. Here is tariff enough to satisfy the most rabid. Nothing can enter Mexico unless it pays a duty. Nothing can pass from one state to another without paying toll when it passes the line. Here must be found a perfect heaven for protectionists. And if wealth and prosperity follow in the wake of the tariff, as is claimed, Mexico ought to be the richest and most prosperous country in the world, and a few years of toil ought to put the day laborer beyond the reach of want. But do these conditions seem to materialize in Mexico as the result of a high tariff?

It strikes me that free trade England, even with the drawback of her laws of primogeniture and her pampered clergy, and bloated aristocracy, would compare favorably with Mexico with her walls of tariff protection.

Now there is a matter which must be settled before the people can act intelligently upon the tariff question, viz., who pays the tariff tax. Mr. Hays says:

"This fallacy is well expressed in Mr. Peck's own words, 'This tax, whatever it may be, is added to the price of the goods, and is ultimately paid by the consumer.' Upon this rotten dogma rests every argument he has produced, and with it every argument falls."

Let us see how the argument falls. A friend of mine went to Canada and bought some horses. I asked him how much they cost him. He opened a book in which he had put down every item of expense from the time he left home until he returned. The price of each horse was set down and the duty he paid. These items were added up, and the amount was divided by the number of horses. Then, said he, they cost me an average of so much, and to realize a reasonable profit I must sell them for so much.

Now who paid the duty? How far does my argument fall? Was not the duty added to the price of the horses, and did not those who purchased the horses ultimately have the duty to pay?

I have seen it stated that all foreign goods were brought to this country by foreigners and that they paid the duty. As silly as the statement is, people are made to believe it. If a Canadian had brought the horses here the result would hav been the same. He would hav asked the same price here he did in Canada, duty and expenses added.

My business has called me along the St. Lawrence river. All along that river petty smuggling is constantly carried on. The people quite frequently showed me their purchases and told me what they paid over the line, and what they would hav cost here. Now, what induced the people to smuggle goods if it was not to save the duty, which would be added to the price of the goods if bought here?

I boarded with a custom house officer for a short time, and every day almost, he told me of some attempt to evade the duty on goods—women were wrapped in laces and silks. It seemed that human invention had been put to the rack to discover some way of getting liquors over the line without paying the duty. If the duty is not added to the price of the goods and paid by the consumer, why do consumers smuggle goods? The people along the border know the difference between the prices of goods when the duty is paid and when it is not paid, and they know that when they smuggle the goods they save just the difference.

"I call upon him (Mr. Peck) to point to one single dollar that he has ever been taxed, or ever been obliged to pay by a protection tariff."

I have always been using such goods as they smuggle and have never smuggled any, therefore, I have been compelled to pay the price of the goods with the duty added, which has cost me not only "one dollar," but many hundreds.

"I call upon him to name a half dozen protected articles which are not cheaper to-day than when they were free from duty. If Mr. Peck can pay duty and get three pounds of wire nails for the same price that he paid for one pound without duty," etc. In 1848 I lived in a house which was put together with nails which cost thirty-two cents a pound; every nail was hand made. When I was a boy we used English pins with wire heads—we now hav a better pin with solid head for less than half the money.

To-day I was looking at a wagon, and told the owner that fifty years ago it took three times the labor to produce a wagon not as good.

The cotton gin saved a vast amount of hand labor and lessened the expense of producing all kinds of cotton fabrics. Every device which saves time and labor tends to lower the price of commodities. He is but a superficial thinker who believes that these wonderful changes in the prices of products hav been brought about by the tariff. For these changes we are indebted to Yankee skill and Yankee ingenuity, and not to any change in the tariff. I hav now answered every point raised by Mr. Hays that could be construed into an argument. And even the points which I have answered are mere statements, there is no argument behind them. If Mr. Hays regards the following as argument, then we differ as to what constitutes argument.

"The statement above quoted is unsustained by a reasonable theory, unsupported by a single fact, as absurd as the plagues of Egypt, untenable as the geology of Moses—assertions that have been refuted a thousand different times in a thousand different ways by a thousand different facts."

This is what Horace Greely would call "hifalutin." I wonder what Mr. Hays thinks this gush of words has to do with the tariff. So far as any argument is concerned he might as well have filled the space with ciphers. He seems to have reached the half-way house between wind and wisdom.

The sermons of fifty years ago were interlarded with just such bulky paragraphs in regard to Infidels in general and "Old Tom Paine" in particular. It is the old Christian way of meeting an argument—a mere gush of words and will apply to one thing as well as another. Corner a minister and he will resort to just such flash-in-the-pan-moonshine nonsense. From a pulpit pounder such a volume of windy words would not surprise me, but I did not look for such a splash of words from one who assumes to be authority on so grave a question.

Now, if there is anything in the tariff, why not get the most out of it? Why should not New England levy a tax on Western pork and beef and grain? They certainly come in direct competition with what is raised there and they might derive quite a revenue from Western products sold in their market. And why should not the West lay a duty on Eastern manufactures and "protect" the "infant industries" of the West?

If we derive a benefit from a tariff on English goods, why should not California lay a tax on hats, boots and shoes, and cloth manufactured in Rhode Island and Massachusetts? Three thousand miles by water are no more than three thousand miles on land?

Why should not each state derive a revenue from the goods brought in from other states? The commerce between the states is so great that if each state would put on a tariff high enough, it would soon become rich from the revenue derived from all the others.

Now, if such a system of taxation would prove suicidal, as everybody will see it must, why should New England be prohibited from getting coal where it is cheapest and most convenient? Why should not the people have the privilege of buying and selling in the markets of Canada and Mexico and any other market where they find it convenient and profitable to do so?

The principle of the tariff fully carried out would make the blacksmith pay a tax on shoeing the tailor's horse and make the tailor pay a tax on making a coat for the blacksmith. Whenever a principle strikes at human rights I will fight it to the death. If I have not got the right to buy and sell where I can do so the most conveniently and advantageously then I hav no rights at all.

The tariff had its origin in a system of blackmail—a species of highway robbery—although it was practiced on the high seas, and it was little better than piracy. Afterwards it was adopted by tyrannical rulers as a means of raising revenue. Vast sums were raised in this unseen manner which would have caused open revolt if the same amount had been raised by direct taxation. Is it not strange that the force of habit will cause the people to fight for the freedom of taxation—fight for the freedom to hold slaves and even fight for the privilege of being enslaved! When a man will fight for his own enslavement he has reached the lowest depths of human degradation.

Can We Dispense With the Deity.

REPLY TO S. F. BENSON.

There is a sense in which every man creates his own deity, as every man creates his own world. Individual conceptions or ideas of God vary as do individual ideas or conceptions of the universe. Former generations held, for instance, very different ideas of the cosmos from th se that prevail to-day. But it is our business as rational beings to bring our ideas, as far as possible, into harmony with absolute truth. Science enables us to reform and correct our ideas in regard to the natural universe, and revelation does the same for our ideas concerning God.

To declare infinite power, unerring wisdom, etc., impossible attributes is to make the deity impossible, since these are inseparable from any adequate idea of God. Less than infinite attributes will not satisfy the infinite cravings of the human soul made "in His image." And it is impossible to monopolize an infinite Deity.

In my argument with Mr. Wettstein I endeavored to show that spirit is fully as demonstratable to me as matter is to him, and that as good, if not better, proofs can be offered of the existence and realty of the former as of the latter. So far from denying my own personal existence, I have insisted all along that it is the one fact of which I am absolutely certain, and thus serves as the basis for whatever knowledge I may possess of anything else.

There is no more necessity for the infinite God to "crowd the whole physical universe out of existence to make room for himself" than there is for the omniprescent law of cohesion or attraction to crowd the whole physical universe out of existence to make room for itself. Does Brother Benson prefer to take his godliness in homeopathic doses?

We do not know that in primitive times there were no infinite gods. As far back as human records extend—and back of them we cannot go—these ideas prevail. Instead of natural objects and processes being the original gods and these being gradually idealized, the very reverse is true. Ideality with its appropriate garb of symbolism marks the dawn of all human history, and the traditions of every race take us back through the days of myth, fable and allegory into the very presence of the immortal God from whom they all claim to have sprung. That God was worshipped through various natural objects that were the acknowledged types and symbols of his various attributes is true, as in the Hebrew scriptures he is called a rock, a lion, a fortress, a sun and shield, etc. It is also true that in process of time, as the religious idea degenerated, the symbol itself came to be deified by the simple-minded and ignorant, yet in the beginning of each form of religion it was not so. The mass of the Persians were probably fire worshipers, yet in the earlier and purer days of the Zoroastrian faith, as among the Druids, it was clearly perceived that fire was not the deity himself, but only his sacred symbol.

As natural science teaches us that we must look to a source above and beyond our earth for the vivifying light and heat that are so essential to our physical existence, so spiritual science, reason and analogy teach us that there must be a higher source than ourslves for the light of wisdom and the warmth of vivifying love that are no less essential to our existence us truly human beings. The lesson that science inculcates that all things have some source or origin beyond themselves leads us likewise to trace all spiritual things to their origin. And as skeptical science laughs at an account of the creation that would bring light into existence several days before the sun was created, so natural analogy rejects the idea that intelligence and love should have no higher origin than the creatures that are evidently their recipiants. The sun of righteousness is no less essential for truly human existence than is the glowing orb around which our little planet revolves.

Ideas are creatures of youth, and our first impressions, from which ideas are formed, are received from without. During our mental childhood, we are as dependent upon others for our ideas as we are during our physical childhood for our bodily sustenance. And some, apparently, never outgrow their mental childhood—never seem to be able to distinguish between an argument and an assumption—an assertion and a demonstration. And the best evidence of intellectual maturity is the development of that rational faculty that enables us to discern between the true and the false, the seeming and the real, as the eye distinguishes light from darkness, and thus receive ideas by the inner way—by intuition or direct revelation from within. While the eye has no power to originate light, it has the ability to recognize, receive and use it. So the mind, while it cannot originate truth, can recognize it when presented, receive it and apply it. But he who receives truth receives it not for himself alone, but for others as well. For it is divinely ordained that the wine of wisdom and the bread of affection—that daily sacrament by which our souls are fed and sustained—shall not only be received by those to whom they are first given, but communicated—passed from hand to hand. This is the real "communion of saints."

And in every age of the world men of superior receptive capacity have been raised up—men like Copernicus or Galileo, Froebel or Oberlin, Martin Luther or Emanuel Swedenborg, Thomas Paine or Henry George—to whom a larger measure of truth could be given, and through whose ministry the race could be lifted up to higher levels scientific, educational, religious or social. True prophets of the Lord are they so long as they are faithful to the divine voice that speaks to and through them—true apostles of the Lord while doing their best to disseminate the light they have received for the benefit of others.

Some Freethinkers may be surprised, as many religionists would be shocked, at the idea of my placing Swedenborg and Paine—the great theologian and the great Infidel—in the same category. But in fact, these two men, so nearly contemporaneous, had many points of similarity. Swedenborg's declaration that the race humanity is our neighbor even more than the individual, and that "all religion has relation to life and the life of religion is to do good" reads very much like Paine's famous saying, "The world is my country; to do good, my religion," uttered but a few decades later. Both were denounced as heretics, and Swedenborg was accused of rejecting the Bible because, seeing the incongruities of the letter that killeth, he claimed that it was indeed throughout what St. Paul calls it—an allegory, and showed how the internal sense, the spirit that giveth life, reconciles all contradictions and removes all absurdities. Paine rejected the literal text for the same reason that Swedenborg did; not having the key to its true meaning, he had not his reason for accepting it as the word of the God he honored and adored. Both men taught the doctrine of liberty of thought and both shared the common fate of those who are ahead of their times. For it is not so much to his contemporaries as to posterity that the man of advanced ideas hands down the cup of salvation and the bread of life that he has received from the bountiful table of the father of us all.

That the wisdom that never errs "not only deludes men into every possible absurdity, but prepares their minds for every form of foolishness and folly," is about as rational a statement as that liberty fetters the soul, education dwarfs the mind, or that love hates! Brother Putnam charges all the ills that hav cursed mankind to religion. Brother Benson attributes them to the wisdom that never errs! But doubtless he is ironical, for Wisdom is always justified of her children, i. e., the results. If these be wise and beneficial their rightful lineage is thereby vindicated; if foolish or hurtful, meaningless or absurd, then are they evidently not the offspring of Wisdom, but of Folly. As well expect to gather grapes of thorns or figs from thistles, as the fruits of Wisdom from the tree of Folly, or to suppose that Wisdom can engender Folly or Folly ever bring forth ought but foolishness.

It has well been said "O Liberty, what crimes hav been committed in thy name!" And it may be said with equal aptness, O Religion—O Wisdom, what horrors hav been wrought, what madness perpetrated in thy name! But Liberty is no less precious, Religion no less sacred, and Wisdom no less desirable because their names and authority hav been borrowed by their opposites. I hav known men who could not seem to distinguish between liberty and license and who hav denounced freedom because to them it meant simply the freedom of some to do as they please regardless of the wishes or welfare of every one else, which is about equal to Pat's idea of equality.

"I say, Pat," says Denis, "isn't wan man as good as another?"

"Indade he is," replies Pat with energy, "and a grate dale betther!" It is not difficult to guess who is the "one man" he has in mind in his reply. And there are people who have no clearer idea of what constitutes wisdom or religion.

Freethought Federation—Treasurer's Report.

The following are the contributions to the treasury of the Freethought Federation of America since last report. We thank our friends for their generous support, and that we hav not been compelled at any time to look into an empty treasury. We hav tried to do the best we could with the means at hand. Something has been done; and something more must still be done. The field is wide. We hav decided to hold the Liberal Congress next October. It is hoped that there will be a large gathering; and that the friends of the Federation will liberally contribute to the expenses. We need funds especially for hall rent and for advertising. It costs a great deal to advertise in the papers of a large city like Chicago, but advertising pays. It draws attention to our work, and we get better reports of our meetings, in the daily press; and in this way our principles are more widely spread. We ask friends to contribute to the best of their ability. Send to E. C. Reichwald, treasurer, 234 South Water street, Chicago.

Perversions of Scripture.

To instance a tithe of the perversions of God's holy word found in our English translation, appointed to be read in churches, would take an entire number of the Freethinker. All the alleged Messianic prophecies are perversions of the Hebrew, as can be seen for the most part from the revised version or from Benisch's Jewish school and family Bible. For the present I confine myself to but one class of perversions—that of proper names. The revised version made a stride toward exactness in allowing some of these to remain untranslated. Thus the misleading "grove" of the authorized version is now "Asherah," and known to pertain to the worship of the Assyrian goddess. The revisers ought to hav gone much farther in this direction. Jahveh should be substituted in every place where we now find the Lord; Elohim should be in place of God; Elyon for most high; Psalm i, 1 should read El-Elohim Jahveh;* Shaddai for Almighty; Kadosh for holy one; and Kadoshim for holy ones. The god of truth, Isaiah lxv, 16 should appear as Amen. Sheol should hav appeared in the passages rendered the pit, the grave, and hell; while the hell of the New Testament should hav been Gehenna, or Hades as it appears in the Greek.

The misrendering of personal names and personifications leads often to an entirely wrong conception. For instance, the word rendered "scapegoat" in Leviticus xvi is Azazel, and Azazel was a personal spirit of evil. This is seen in the revised version of Leviticus xvi, 8, "And Aaron shall cast lots upon two goats, the one lot for the Lord, (Jahveh) and the other lot for Azazel," the one being as much a personal spirit as the other. The "screech-owl" of our Isaiah xxxiv, 14, ought to be Lilith, the spirit of the night, who was fabled to be the wife of Adam, his nightly consort. The vulgate renders [the Greek term] by Lamia, the name of the Libyan queen, who was said to prey on children, and whose name became an equivalent for witch. To this day Russian Jews believe in and attempt to propitiate Lilith. In the curious passage in Proverbs xxx, 15, "the horse-leach hath two daughters crying, Giv, Giv," again it should be "Alukah hath two daughters." Alukah was another name of an evil spirit—a sort of nemesis or vampire supposed to hover o'er the sinner like an evil fate. So in Psalms xci. 6, for "the pestilence which walketh in darkness," we should read "Debher who stalketh in darkness"—Debher being related to the Babylonian plague-demon, Dibbara; and in the latter part of the verse we should read "from Keteb"—that is, the demon destroys at noon-day; for so the Targum renders it. In all these cases the authorized version conceals the evidence that the Bible writers believed in demons.

It may be said that the Hebrew terms, if untranslated, are meaningless; whereas the rendering of the Authorized Version givs some meaning. But this is my objection—that the meaning given is a wrong one. The fact that the Hebrew term is meaningless at once suggests inquiry, while the other puts it aside by a perversion. The person who reads that "he brought out the grove from the house of the Lord" (2 Kings xxiii, 6) may wonder how the deuce a grove got into Solomon's shanty. But a person who reads in the Revised Version that it was the Asherah he brought out will be prepared to read the essay on "Phallic Worship Among the Jews," in "Bible Studies."

A prime necessity for the right understanding of old faiths is, that personifications should remain personifications. What a jumble we should make of Vedic religion if for "Agni" we always read "fire," or of Greek if for "Hera" we read "air." Rationalizers would hav us read "the accuser," instead of "Satan," and turn the story of the temptation of Christ into an allegory. The only rational result of such interpretation is to make God and Christ just as much an allegory as Satan.

A deliberate perversion of a proper name, amounting to forgery, is the insertion of n in Judges xviii, 30, changing Moses into Mannasseh in order to destroy the damning evidence that the descendants of Moses were idolators "until the day of the captivity of the land." So in Jere. xxxi, 6, for the "watchmen" on Mount Ephraim we should read the "Nazirim" or Nazarenes. In the famous Jacob's blessing (Gen. xlix, 10) they hav made a person of a place. "Until Shiloh come" should be "until he come to Shiloh." So, in Micah i, 10, Aphrah, instead of the name of a person, is the name of a village. In 1 Chron. ix, 15, Bakbakkar, Heresh, probably should be one person, Bakbakkar the carpenter. Amos v. 26, confuses names and things. It should read, "You bear Succoth your sheik, Chiun (Saturn?) your images, your star gods which ye made to yourselvs." Isa. lxv, 11, instead of reading, "But ye are they that forsake the Lord, that forget my holy mountain, that prepare a table for that troop, and that furnish the drink-offering unto that number," should read, "But ye that forsake Jahveh, that forget my sacred hill, that array a table for Gad and mix drink for Meni." The Revised Version has, "that prepare a table for Fortune and that fill up mingled wine into Destiny." Verse 16 of the same chapter, instead of "the god of truth," should be "the god Amen," the Egyptian god, whose worship was established in Palestine by Ramses II., who is declared in the Harris papyrus to hav erected in Philistia a Rammesseum to Amen in the city of Canaan. This god has found his way into all Christian liturgies.

There is another kind of perversion, which consists in putting sense and beauty where there are none in the original. Now, both the Hebrew and Greek are replete with verbal faults and illogicalities, which are usually respectably covered over by our beautiful English translation. Sometimes they peep out, as in the jumble of Ecclesiastes iv 16 and Job xxviii. 3, 4, or the illogicalities of "Ye shall all be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you" (Deut. xxviii 68), or the famous bull of 2 Kings xix, 35 and Isaiah xxxvii. 36, "And when they arose early in the morning behold they were all dead corpses." Our translators have been more decent than the Holy Ghost, substituting "abominations" for "dungy gods" (Deut. xxix. 17), and toning down some of the purple passages in Ezekiel and the Song of Songs which is not Solomon's—Uncle Benjamin, in London Freethinker.

One of the seven things which are "an abomination" in the sight of our heavenly father is "a proud look" (Prov. vi, 17). We should therefore look very much ashamed when we remember that we are his children and that he was the father of people whom he killed for Joshua.

"Testimonies" to Christ.

No other character in history has received the extravagant eulogies, the unjustifiable and indiscriminate laudation, accorded to the central figure of the Christian religion. The followers of Jesus never falter in their assertion that he was a perfect man, whose teachings and examples were the grandest in the history of ethics. This foolish exaltation of the man of Nazareth, I regret to say, is not wholly confined to Christians. Some prominent Freethinkers hav bended the knee to this old relic of sun-worship. Renan's absurd statement is a case in point. Even Colonel Ingersoll, in my opinion, overestimates the real value of the Sermon on the Mount. When the character of Christ is criticised, modern Christians will shield themselvs behind these "Infidel testimonies," and we often find tracts and books issued by religious houses full of such quotations. Some Freethinkers, of course, are responsible for this, and to add fuel to the fire, Christians misquote and misrepresent what great Infidels hav said. As I write, I hav before me a work entitled, "Infidelity Refuted by Infidels," by Samuel P. Sprencher, D.D., and here we find one entire chapter of these testimonials. So far as testimonials are concerned, they are the cheapest things in the world and the easiest to get. The majority of them are from Deistic Infidels and Unitarians. The worship of Jesus is a superstition, and with some it is the last one to be cast off. Ninety-nine out of a hundred modern Freethinkers will repudiate the sentiments of this class of Liberals. We also find a favorable word for Jesus invariably quoted by such authors as Mr. Sprencher, but where the writer has criticised him, good care is taken not to mention the fact. He quotes from Rousseau, but every one knows that his quotation for this purpose is a most ridiculous fraud, for Rousseau is here not supposed to speak his own sentiments, but those of the Savoyard vicar.

It would be a most vicious man indeed of whom his enemies did not make a few favorable statements, and Christians of to-day, instead of discussing the character of Jesus upon his merits, screen themselvs behind these alleged testimonials.

Many intelligent people will reject Christ's divinity, but they are unable yet to see how illogical is the idea of a personal God; at the same time, the influence of early education makes them still reverence Jesus as a man.

Compare Jesus with other great teachers. Sift his sentiments and actions, and lay them side by side with those of other men. Test his character by the same standard that you would any other man of his day. When judged by the method applied to other great characters of history, Christ is in no sense a great man or great teacher. Had he not been sheltered by the dogma of divinity, which was enforced by the sword and the stake, he would not hav even occupied a prominent place in the history of the last eighteen centuries.

Men pass into history as great men because of some great movement for human rights that they hav started; others, because they hav made a great discovery that will benefit the human family; others, again, because they established a system of philosophy. Those whom we revere to-day are men and women who hav done these things.

Christ lived in a day when human rights were not recognized by those who were in power. Slavery was in existence, yet he said nothing against it. War was rife, and was for mere conquest and extermination, and yet Christ said, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." The common people were densely ignorant and superstitious. They were held in subjection because means were furnished for the gratification of their passions. Where did Christ lift his voice against any of these evils? What discovery did he make, either in the mental, physical, or moral world? None. His sayings are simply disconnected moral maxims taught by philosophers centuries before his birth. He established no system of philosophy, and the Christianity of to-day is more the work of Paul than of Jesus.

It is next said that Christ taught the best system of morality known and that he was a perfect man. True, he said and did some very good things. But he did no more than thousands of others hav done, both before and after him. He was an extremist, a fanatic—sometimes raised to fury and at others driven to a compassion and leniency, which, if carried into practice, would end in placing a premium upon theft and vagrancy. He said, "Love your enemies," and at the same time, "Those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me." He could say, "Bless them that curse ye;" but to those who had not given him bread, water, or visited him in prison he thundered out the words, "Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." As a sculptor would chisel out a beautiful statue and then chip it to pieces, so Christ nullified his good teachings by introducing evil ones.

In spite of this, Jesus is said to be a perfect character. Such a character it would be hard to define, as no one has yet decided what a perfect man is, and probably no one ever will. Yet if you admit that he is a man so endowed that he could not commit sin, what a farce it is to hold him up as a model for a humanity prone to fall into error! For one man to be an example for another or for all the world, there must be something in common between him and the rest of mankind. Abraham Lincoln is looked upon as a model by the American youth struggling against adversity to obtain some station in life. Why? Because Lincoln himself began at the foot of the ladder, and, casting aside all obstacles, reached the highest position in the gift of his countrymen. If Lincoln had been a perfect man, and bound in his very nature to be what he was, where would there be a bond of sympathy between him and the young American? Therefore admitting Christ to be a perfect man, there is nothing about him which would justify us in looking upon him as a great exemplar. If you admitted that Jesus was a natural man, prone to fall into error, and yet resisting temptation to a great degree, he would be a moral inspiration, but as Christianity holds him up before the world he can be nothing more than a theological automaton.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

Self-Government.

Self-government is the practice of self-reliance and self-support distinguished from national care or paternalism. When a people adopts the principle of self-government, each member of the community has the liberty and is supposed to hav the capacity, to gain his own living in some honest way. He is presumed to know enough not to sow sunflower seeds to raise wheat, not to buy bad butter the second time from the same tub, not to spend half his money for drink on Saturday night and then blame his wife for not being happy, not to pay for a priest against his will, not to read Solomon's Songs, or Don Juan blindly, etc. Hence there cannot consistently be an expensiv government commisioner of agriculture to distribute seeds, nor an inspector to taste butter, nor a detectiv spy to show one when and how to get a drink, nor a chaplain priest to amuse himself at public expense, nor a Comstock censorship to guide implied imbecils.

But our people hav been just that inconsistent—hav gone back to paternalism—petitioning the government for all sorts of help, and blaming it for all their mishaps. They seem not to know the great change in our government from what it was a century ago.

The idea of self-government, from a national point of view, was first conceived in our Declaration of Independence, and had its birth in the adoption of the federal Constitution. I know of no nation previous to that time that recognized any such thing as self-government All the governments of earth claim to rest on, and to be influenced by gods, demons, and occult forces about which the people had no right to question.

At the time of the American Revolution all the different Christian sects were represented among the colonists in such proportions as to exclude a hope on the part of any one of them to become dominant. Fortunately each sect desired peace and safety for itself, and was therefore in a condition to listen to reason. They listened to the good and sufficient common sense reasons of Thomas Paine, to whom more than to any other man—perhaps more than to all other men—is due the credit of inducing the colonists to unite for independence and liberty.

But the colonists had learned a good deal from their recent experiences. They were more intelligent in regard to religious persecutions than are the people of to-day. Many of them still felt the smart of persecution. They were familiar with the evils of the divine-right claim of kings, of hereditary paternal government, and of church influence over all; and they had no intention, when free from British rule, of adopting any part of that system. Hence they devised a system granting to government a minimum of authority, and securing to the people a maximum of liberty. They established a federal government with specific powers only, reserving all else to the states and the people. They granted no power to meddle with the liberty of the individual, for or against, and no right to favor or protect any class as such. There is no paternalism, no censorship, no religion, in the Constitution. The Federal government was intended to perform only such functions as the states separately could not well do—coining money, controlling public lands, foreign relations, etc. The individual was guaranteed liberty in the pursuit of happiness, and was presumed to possess the ability to support himself—and family if he had any.

With this simple rigging the ship of state was started on the ocean of time. All went fairly well for a while. The elder Adams imitated, in some respects, the customs of monarchy; but the protests of the people, and Jefferson's administration, soon righted the ship. Then it was found necessary to whip old Mrs. Britain a second time to gain real independence. Down to that period there was trouble with the old lady all the time, and with France much of it, causing extra expense. The revenue was raised mostly from direct taxes and excise duties. Commerce was free to run the gauntlet of foreign interference until war was declared. With no special protection of, or interference with, any branch of business by the federal government, the strength and prosperity of the republic at that time are shown in the events of the second war. The Americans captured 56 British vessels of war, and 2,360 merchant vessels—many of them armed. And they lost in the contest 25 vessels of war, and about 1,500 merchantmen. Here is shown a pretty big business done on the waters. Add to this the cost of the fight on land during two and a half years, and what think you was the total expenditure of the United States government during that whole time? Niles's Register records it as about one hundred million dollars. Think of that! Two and a half years of war! Why the government is now paying out more than that every year in pensions to patriots who do not practice self-government, and who think the country was of no account before the Civil War.

At the close of the war of 1812–14, an increase of duties—some ten per cent ad valorum—to pay the war debt was laid on imports. Soon this was felt by some manufacturers to be an advantage to them, and they petitioned, from time to time, for more help of that kind. In 1824 a bill was reported from the Ways and Means committee increasing the tariff on imports for the sole purpose of protection. On that occasion Daniel Webster said: "Look to the present state of our laws. Consider that most of our revenue is now collected at the custom-house, and then say what propriety there is in calling on the government for protection, as if no protection was now afforded. Suppose all nations to act on the principle of prohibition; then, according to the argument, they would be prosperous in the proportion in which they abolished intercourse with one another," etc.

Although this bill became a law, the different branches of business, previous to our Civil War, were conducted with comparativ moderation and regularity. Legislation had not yet undertaken to abolish wholly the natural law of supply and demand. Self-support was the rule; only a few besieging Congress for aid. During, and since, that war, however, the rush in money-making schemes, aided by government grants, patents, and protectiv tariffs—resulting in trusts and monopolies—has changed the former conditions of comparativ equality to those of the widest disparity. In the clamor for aid and protection the boasted principle of self-government is lost sight of, and the government has lost sight of its constitutional limitations.

The workingman, too, demands government aid. He votes for every extravagance, expecting therefrom more work; and Congress, through tariffs, eight-hour laws, etc., succeeds in raising his wages. But these very measures hav flooded the country with foreign laborers, and our workingman is worse off than ever. Is there any harder place for him this side of Siberia than the Pennsylvania coal mines—all protected?

Now every meddlesome law entails cost—more officials, more courts; and the aggregate customs-service protection is enormously costly. Look at the difference in one century of time. Thomas Paine did not imagin that Americans would so soon prove themselvs such fools as to beat the world in extravagance. He says: "A monarchy measures its prosperity by the quantity of revenue it extorts; a republic proves its excellence by the small quantity of taxes it requires."

For the year 1782 (omitting the army, which was being disbanded) Paine estimated the aggregate cost of both Federal and state governments to be about $4,000,000. The toiler may see just where he is at by comparing the cost of this year with that. Think of it! At the present time that sum is not enough for three days. "More population," says the crowd. Well, I deny the need of another inspector because, owing to a momentary lapse of self-government, my wife happens to bear twins. Taking federal and state governments together, we now hav the most costly rule on earth, and more officials than any two other nations.

The workingman with no property is apt to assume that great expense of government and consequent high taxation do not affect him adversely—that those who hav property pay it all. But he is fond of saying that all wealth is the product of labor. Now, just so far as that assertion is true, is it also true that the burden of national cost and debt is upon him, as he finds when he tries to gain and own a home. The trouble is he does not see that the taxes are drawn in some form from all, and are paid out to a few. The higher the tax, the higher the rent; and to be idle a month brings starvation near.

Congress may violate but cannot abolish a natural law. By unwise legislation it has attracted foreign labor greatly in excess of what can be profitably used. The factories glut the market with their productions, then reduce wages or stop altogether; and we hav the natural results of meddlesome legislation. Paternalism and self-government are incompatible. Even when not claiming divine authority, paternalism assumes to be a power separate from and above the people. It predicates a people incapable of caring for themselvs, and a government of wisdom to care for them—a gigantic poorhouse arrangement. How does that look, Mr. American? Well, sir, every time you petition Congress to tax a neighbor's fish because you happen to own a fish-pond, or coal because you own a coal-mine; to inspect butter because an idiot can't tell bad from good; to interfere between capital and labor; to prescribe the hours one may and may not work, as if the American sovereign doesn't know when to begin or stop; to compel others to conform to your code of morals, etc.—you are encouraging paternalism and voting away your own liberty. And every time your petition is granted by law, the Constitution is violated. The practice by law of paternalism increases the evil of pauperism. And it tends to man or hero worship.

Whole nations almost are now worshiping a man supposed to hav lived about nineteen hundred years ago; and history is dotted with saints and demigods receiving praise—some for having successfully palmed off crazy dreams for godly revelations, some for fasting to death, others for slaughtering multitudes of their fellow-men. We are still making heroes. We invest the successful candidate for high office with greatness not accorded him before. And many a patriot has a portrait of his ideal general or president—supposed to be the receptacle of some divine influx—hanging in his bedroom, before which he strips and prostrates himself, thankful and proud to be a follower. With a little more gilt the president's chair may yet hold a king—let voters beware!

There abideth crown, paternalism, popery—these three; but the meanest is popery. When religion is dominant, liberty expires. The Christian church now, more than ever before, is striving to force upon this nation the code of Jesus in place of religious freedom. In this code we encounter gods, devils, and hell all at once, with the claim that in them is the source of all government. The priest of this church is a bigger man to-day than he was in 1776. At that time the different Christian sects held their peace, but in process of time pious hate broke out again, and a generation ago each sect, having itself alone the exact truth, had become bold enough to defy the others. An orthodox sermon on total depravity, or some such hard fare, generally concluded with, as a kind of dessert, a godly fusillade on the papacy—that old harlot sitting astride the seven hills of Rome, the great whore of Babylon, the anti-Christ, etc.

But after a few years of this kind of Christian recreation the Protestant clergy began to perceive a dangerous (to them) growth of Infidelity. They now think it necessary for their own salvation to join hands with even the Catholic priest. They wink at each other as they pass by. They meet together on the anniversary platform of a humane society founded by an Infidel, and unite in claiming for their church all the credit—a church which continues the religious system that for many centuries suppressed all Freethought with torture and dungeon; that burned valuable libraries; that tore the quivering flesh of a Hypatia; that kindled the fagot-fire that consumed a Bruno, etc. Murderers of Freethinkers in the past, they now brazenly claim to be promoters of liberty, and strangely manage to gain belief from the multitude. They profess deep interest in the workingman; and this is the way:

> They come together and join with Rome.
> To preserve the plan that robs his home.

The priest is present everywhere, whether wanted or not. He is in the legislativ hall, in the court-room, with the army, at the wedding, and in at death.

Independent support appeals to one's pride; and the man who beseeches gods and governments for personal favors is not fitted for self-government. To preserve the liberty we now hav, our government should return to constitutional simplicity and giv the people a chance to practice self-government. Looking for no extraneous aid, they would better learn to care for themselvs, and sooner make an end of the priest. But begging boodle favors of government produces a boodle government.

Untaxed Property in this State.

COMPTROLLER ROBERTS PLACES ITS VALUE AT $581,178,701.

State Comptroller Roberts has completed the tabulation by counties of all the property in the state exempt from taxation, which aggregates $581,178,701. The comptroller's department has been working on this for over a year, and the tables hav been submitted to the constitutional convention. These are the only statistics in the possession of the state government on this subject, and are of much value and interest. The total amount of state property exempt from taxation is $31,671,521; county property, $12,913,310; town, city, and village property, $229,268,105; school property, $61,603,411; property purchased with pension money, $683,903; national government property, $49,805,120; property of churches, parsonages, and cemeteries, $134,761,444; property of charitable and reformatory institutions, $53,987,184; miscellaneous property, $6,457,703.

The following table shows by counties the aggregate amount of property exempted from taxation, and the amount by counties of property exempted from taxation devoted to the uses of churches and charitable and reformatory institutions:

—New York Sun.

An elaborate process of mental disciplin, with a view to strengthening the critical powers of the mind, is utterly remote from the spirit of theology; and this is one of the great reasons why the growth of an inductiv and scientific spirit is invariably hostil to theological interests. To raise the requisite standard of proof, to inculcate hardness and slowness of belief, is the first task of the inductiv reasoner. He looks with great favor upon the condition of a suspended judgment; he encourages men rather to prolong than to abridge it; he regards the tendency of the human mind to rapid and premature generalizations as one of its most fatal vices; he desires especially that that which is believed should not be so cherished that the mind should be indisposed to admit doubt, or, on the appearance of new arguments. to revise, with impartiality, its conclusions. Nearly all the greatest intellectual achievements of the last three centuries hav been preceded and prepared by the growth of scepticism. The historic scepticism which Vico, Beaufort, Pouilly, and Voltaire in the last century, and Niebuhr and Lewes in the present century, applied to ancient history lies at the root of all the great modern efforts to reconstruct the history of mankind. The splendid discoveries of physical science would hav been impossible but for the scientific scepticism of the school of Bacon, which dissipated the old theories of the universe, and led men to demand a severity of proof altogether unknown to the ancients. The philosophic scepticism of Hume and Kant has given the greatest impulse to metaphysics and ethics. Exactly in proportion, therefore, as men are educated in the inductiv school, they are alienated from those theological systems which represent a condition of doubt as sinful, seek to govern the reason by the interests and the affections, and make it a main object to destroy the impartiality of the judgment.—W. E. H. Lecky.

"Lights and Shadows," by the Rev. F. G. Lee, seems a curious book, if we may judge by a review of it in the Pall Mall Gazette. The author tells a story of John Brown, a negro physician, who publicly denied his Maker (capital, please). "These frightful utterances—coarser than those of the American 'leaders of thought' and the 'advanced thinkers'—had no sooner passed his lips when (sic) the man, suddenly seized by a terrible spasm, shrieking out 'O God!' fell suddenly off his chair, writhing on the floor, paralyzed, and, for some minutes, apparently dead. He was removed to an adjacent room, where, stiff with pain and racked with agony, he continued to breathe till the morning." Was there ever a more extraordinary jumble of nonsense? A blasphemer is paralyzed, at the same time he writhes, and also at the same time he appears to be dead! A wonderful blasphemer, indeed. "An inquest was held," Mr. Lee continues, "the whole facts were set forth, including a detailed statement of his many blasphemous and faithless words; but the jury returned a verdict of death from apoplexy." Many negroes "shook their heads at this bold verdict," and Mr. Lee shakes his too. It must be easy for Mr. Lee to shake his head. It cannot be very heavy.—London Freethinker.

"It is of comparativly little consequence what these pagan nations are going to war about. The most important thing is to see them fairly launched in the conflict that must vastly benefit both, no matter who shall be victor or vanquished. The Bible can fight its own battle in Christian countries, but when it is confronted by the unbelief of the pagan, the sword and the battle-ax are the most important handmaids of Christian civilization. Both these nations need the lesson of a great war with each other, and while war is to be deplored on general principles, a war between China and Japan could not but result in priceless benefits to liberal religious ideas." —Philadelphia Times.

That is as frankly atrocious a Christian deliverance as we hav read in many a day. It makes no difference what the five hundred millions of Orientals are slaughtering each other for, the important thing being that they are engaged in the work of death, for that is going to help carry the Bible to those who may be left! The Bible must be forced on to the "pagans" with Manlicher guns and rapid fire batteries. The "pagan" is so unreasoningly obdurate! He will cling to his musty sacred books, that were old before the Bible was written. He is determined not to recognize the superlativ virtues of those "liberal religious ideas" whose most effectiv missionaries are the sword, the torch, the war ship. The Times is right about one thing—"the sword and the battle-ax are the most important handmaids of Christian civilization." But think of the mingled bathos and insolence of calling the religion that needs such handmaids "liberal"! As matters of fact, the Bible cannot successfully "fight its own battle in Christian countries," and the leaders of thought in the New Japan will hav none of it. Here its apologists are constantly appealing to the government for help, while in the Orient, as in Catholic countries, those who drop one superstition are not eager to take up another and still less coherent one.

Constancy Will Win, if Anything Can.

ESTES PARK, COL., Aug. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 21st has just reached me, so I know you hav changed the address. You can scarcely imagin how "rusty" one becomes by missing four numbers of your paper.

I consider your position in regard to American Protectiv Associations very commendable. In allowing all reforms to be discussed in the columns of your paper you hav, I think, the praise of all genuin Freethinkers.

Your missionary scheme is worthy of applause and assistance. Inclosed please find $1.08, all I can spare at present. I suggest five names, myself included. Kindly select the other three. The eight cents is for a copy of the famous issue of June 9th. You apparently believe that constancy of purpose will win.

It is Time for a Change.

VINELAND, N. J., Aug. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: All who hav voted for either of the old political parties in the last twenty years hav voted themselvs slaves—slaves to pay the taxes on millions of dollars worth of church property devoted to pride and fashion, and of no real benefit to anybody but the priesthood. Slaves doomed to lose one day in seven, because these fraudulent churches call it holy time, and to be fined or imprisoned for hauling in a load of hay on that day to save it from being ruined by the storm, or doing any other work that would save them from loss. It is time for a change. Let all the Liberals of the nation unite and form a new party, and let the Liberal papers at once search out and nominate honest men for the next president and members of Congress and the state legislators. They will be astonished at their success. Thousands of churchmen want honest men for rulers, and as they can use folded votes, so that no one will know who they vote for, they will vote even for Infidels, if they know they are honest; and if they do not succeed in electing their candidates, they will show their strength and gain the respect of all honest, thoughtful men, and prepare the way for success at the next election. J. HACKER.

Charles Robinson Dead.

ATCHISON, KAS., August 19, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Ex-Governor Charles Robinson, of Kansas, passed away at his home near Lawrence, Friday, August 17, aged 76 years. His death was due to a complication of diseases from which he had suffered with fortitude for a long time. Although Dr. Robinson was a pronounced Freethinker, the funeral occurred from the Congregational church, Rev. Dr. Howland, a Unitarian minister, officiating. It is claimed by some that Dr. Robinson leaned toward the Unitarian creed. But be this as it may, we know that he was a conspicuous figure in the great Liberal encampments held at Bismarck, Ottawa, and Lawrence some years ago and that his zeal for the cause of Freethought was great. Dr. Robinson was the first governor of Kansas and in Kansas' history his name will forever be associated with those of John Brown and Gen. "Jim" Lane. As Mr. Goodenow in his introduction to Dr. Robinson's book, "The Kansas conflict," says: "Any history of Kansas without Governor Robinson as a prominent figure would be like the play 'Hamlet' with Hamlet left out." He was a man of noble qualities, and his loss will be deeply deplored.

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

Will Speak His Sentiments.

LAWRENCEBURG, TENN., Aug. 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER four months; you will find $1 inclosed. I am a young man of nineteen and liv in one of the most orthodox little towns in the state, having about fifteen hundred inhabitants with eight organized churches and five church houses, while two more will soon be completed. We hav only two schools, one Catholic and the other Protestant, and the latter never had a decent school building until last year. I feel very proud and thankful that I hav a free brain and hav done my own thinking upon the subject of Christianity since I hav been able to read and comprehend. Books and papers hav been a great relief to me. My parents are members of an orthodox church. I find only a few of my belief in this section and what few are here do not speak their sentiments, but for myself I intend to denounce in public and private, from a reasonable standpoint, the dogmas of the orthodox church, although Republicanism and Infidelity are not at all popular in the South, but I love the South because it gave me birth, and the North because it is a part of my country. I know no line to divide us. MARION RICHARDSON.

Mortuary—Fletcher Palmer.

DEPOSIT, N. Y., July 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I mail you a paper to-day which contains an account of the death of my father, and an address which was intended to be read at the funeral; but for some cause, unknown to me, it was not read. The Episcopal minister read over some of their services.

My father was an out-and-out Freethinker and always ready to express his views, almost too frankly to make friends. He was very fond of our good old TRUTH SEEKER, of which he always has had mine. He was a great admirer of Mr. Bennett, and often said that Macdonald was as good as Bennett. If you can spare space to giv a short account of his death, I should like very much to hav it in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

His five sons and one grandson carried him to the grave. It is a pity we hav no way of burying our dead without the services of those who are so repulsiv to us in life. Hoping this is not so long that you will be unable to read it, I remain a friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER,

JOHN P. PALMER.

[We giv below part of the newspaper report, including a portion of Mr. A. Mulford's paper which was prepared to be read at the funeral, but was pigeon-holed. Possibly "the Episcopal minister" could explain its non-appearance. We join with our correspondent in regretting the activ presence of ministers at the obsequies of Freethinkers, and will add that we do not think such assistance is necessary. A copy of "The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Ceremonies" would enable any intelligent person to take the place of a clergyman with acceptance to all sincere respecters of the dead. Lack of space prevents the reproduction of all of Mr. Mulford's paper.—ED. T. S.]

Fletcher Palmer was born Oct. 6, 1810, received a common school education, and was admitted to the bar and practiced law for a number of years, was an activ participant in the anti-rent war, occupied an official position under the general government during the administration of President Lincoln; was a member of assembly in the state legislature in 1858, from Delaware county; was justice of the peace for the town of Deposit, Delaware county for many years, and was acting as such at the time of his death.

A unique and positiv character has passed away and the community of which he was an important factor is, although perhaps only dimly conscious of it, bereaved by his absence. In the rites of respect which it is our wont to pay to the memory of the dead, sad though they may be, it is yet well for us to contemplate the life of one who has gone. What light did he shed along his path? . . . During his lifetime he was not a man of the crowd. He was not a member of any social or secret organization. He belonged to no church, he had no creed. But he belonged to and was a member of a broader and wider organization than any secular or religious one, and that the brotherhood of man. Toward that all his sympathies were extended, and to his family and to that all his energies and abilities were devoted. Proof of this is found in the fact that in this rapacious, grasping, money-loving, and materialistic age, we find that in the main he died a poor man. His life was not devoted to the accumulation of wealth for the purpose of self-gratification or to giv him power over his kind nor to distinguish him from his fellows. He had no disposition to acquire money to use to glorify self at the expense of others or to coerce others to do his will, to some the only incentiv for its acquisition. He was a courageous, compassionate, tender-hearted, justice-loving man, and in all the walks of life it has never been said of him that he was either a truckler, a coward, or a liar. He loved truth for the sake of truth. He scorned to tell a lie. He hated shams, deceptions, lies, and hypocrisies. He loved honesty, sincerity, courage, and truthfulness. He ever loved the right; he always hated the wrong. He was a just man in all of his dealings with his fellow men. He has never been accused of committing an act against the rights of the people.

In his domestic relations he was amiable and kind. He was a good husband, he was a tender, loving father. He faithfully obeyed all the moral obligations that make the social compact. Nature had done much for him. His power of arriving at the truth or falsity of a thing within his comprehension was marvelous. He readily grasped and comprehended truths in the midst of complicated details, and no refinement or sophistry could obscure his intellectual vision or hinder the right solution of a question within the limit of his ready intelligence. His knowledge of books was not vast, but his knowledge of human nature was great, by which, combined with a certain quality of penetrating intellect akin to intuition which he possessed in a remarkable degree, he was able oftimes to arrive at the right solution of a question involving the rights and wrongs of parties, quicker than most men. All of these qualifications made him an able and impartial magistrate in the court over which he presided at the time of his death.

In that court he manifested in the highest degree the excellencies of his character. I am sure that all who intimately knew him will bear me out in the assertion, that in the administration of justice he was above reproach and absolutely free from favoritism, and that from his perception of the right and wrong involved in a case he applied, so far as lay in his judgment and power, the rules and principles of equity and law, as the facts and justice in the case would warrant. He was absolutely incorruptible, and I hav yet to find a man or hear of such that ever had the hardihood during his judicial career to suggest that he was guilty of ever having by act or deed polluted the stream of justice in any way or manner. He ever stood the uncomprising foe of wrong and the perpetration of wrong, and I am sure that he loved to defend the weak and the helpless. I am sure that his heart overflowed with kindness to neighbors and that charity ever found room in his heart.

Who Pays the Tariff Tax?

RUTLAND, VT., August 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: It seems to me that any Freethinker who has been free to think, must long ere this hav learned that a protecting tariff is only one of the ways by which the wealth-producing laborer of the country is fleeced by the capitalistic employer of labor. If he has been at all thoughtful, he must hav learned that whatever the capitalists hav gained by a protecting tariff, or otherwise, has been taken from the wages of labor; for, as all wealth is the product of labor, and as all expenses hav to be paid out of the current wealth produced, and as the capitalist and employer of labor—as such—does not labor, and consequently does not produce wealth, it follows that labor has to bear the burden. How, then, can the wealth-producing people of the country be benefited by a protectiv tariff, the expense of which they hav to pay? If we hav watched at all closely the proceedings of the last Congress, we must hav seen that all the controversy concerning the tariff has been between capitalists of different interests.

Why do we waste our time in repeating, parrot like, the sayings of political hirelings in the interest of corporate monopoly whilst all over our land laboring people are starving because of our unjust social system, maintained in the interest of corporate monopoly? It was a long time before the people could be induced to join hands with the abolitionists in the fight for the abolition of chattel slavery, but after we had become somewhat conscious of the wickedness of chattel slavery, what would we hav said of the slave-owners if they had driven thousands upon thousands of their slaves to a state of starvation, as the capitalistic employers of labor are doing by their employees here in the Northern states to-day? Oh, why do we waste our time in defending old superstitious notions?

I hav been prompted to write these few lines by reading Mr. Hays's article, "Mr. Peck and the Tariff," in THE TRUTH SEEKER, August 25th, in which he says:

"I call upon Mr. Peck for facts instead of theories. I call upon him, or any other free trader living, to name a half-dozen protected articles which are not cheaper to-day than when they were free of duty."

The theory of protection is that our manufacturers cannot produce in competition with the manufacturer of cheap foreign "pauper-made" goods. Now, acting upon that theory, if protection makes articles cheaper than free trade, is not protection a greater injury to American industries than free trade? Most certainly; because if competition has called into use improved labor-saving machinery, as a consequence of protection, and has reduced prices below that of foreign "cheap labor," protection has, by the use of labor-saving machinery, displaced more American labor than the importation of foreign cheap labor products would hav displaced, and, consequently, has retarded the general prosperity of the nation of people to a greater extent. He says further:

"I call upon him to point to one dollar that he has ever been taxed or ever been obliged to pay by a protectiv tariff."

What in the world then has the protectiv tariff ever done for anybody? Senator David B. Hill favors a tariff when American products come into competition with foreign products equal to the difference in cost of labor abroad and labor at home. Such a tariff, if it enabled the American employer of labor to add this difference to the price of his goods, would reduce the cost to him of American labor to the cost of labor to the foreign employers of labor, and American labor would hav it to pay. If it don't do this it don't do anything. If the tariff costs the American consumer nothing, it is of no earthly use whatever. It does not protect.

He says Mr. Peck "cannot see that the same means which compel the widow to pay an extra dollar for coal will compel the Americans, under free trade, to pay extra dollars for European goods." Why! that seems strange. But if free trade did compel Americans to pay extra for foreign goods, it would, according to the theory of protection, be a boon to American industries. And on the heels of that he says: "He cannot see that the free admission of foreign goods will hav precisely the same effect on American wage earners as will the free admission of foreign laborers, though in a much greater degree." Well, if free trade would further the interests of monopoly, Mr. Hays is about right in this; but it seems a strange argument for a protectionist.

Some Remarks About Spirit Phenomena.

HARWICH, MASS, Aug. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Wettstein is smart, forcible, and perhaps unanswerable in any and every way except when dealing with spirit phenomena; and in no other way can Spiritualism be proven, if even in that. But there are phenomena, purporting to be spirit, which are beyond the ken of man and performed out of the ordinary course of things. The only question with me is, Is it of departed intelligent spirits or is it all of this mundane life? Who doubts that we are spirits here in this life? I do not. But do we lose our identity at the close of this life? is the question. Do flesh, blood, and bones think? Amputate a leg; that healed, amputate the other; that healed, amputate an arm; that healed, amputate the other. Armless, legless—are his thinking powers less? A man's nervous system is not all in his head, though mostly there. The legless man, I am told, senses his leg, though it be bereft of the visible material. Some "Materialists" deny the phenomena and some do not. I do not, though I believe seven-eighths of the manifestations are frauds. I hav heard sane, intelligent men and women tell of marvelous performances—heavy tables and even pianos being lifted from the floor while only the medium's fingers rested upon them. Were they hallunciated? Did they see as do drunkards when having the deliriums? "Oh, you must not depend upon hearsay!" I know hearsay is very often unreliable, but wait a moment. I do not pretend to hav seen much of "spirit manifestations," but that little was not hallucination. I once improvised a table with an aperture cut in the top over which a box, with one side open, was placed. As soon as the medium took her seat at the table a hand came up through the aperture of the table, showing itself plainly against the black background of the box. The medium could not hav got her hand there without an elongation of her arm to twice its ordinary length, unless she got down under the table. But that she could not hav done without being discovered by the spectators, one or two of whom sat by her side. The hand made its appearance a number of times and the fingers moved as naturally and nimbly as life. In the evening of the same day we had a "dark circle" of about fifteen persons sitting with hands joined, while the medium sat in the middle of the circle clapping her hands to allay suspicion. Meanwhile we had pattings upon our hands all around the circle in quick succession and instruments passed around from one to the other, and some slate-writing, etc. But the most convincing demonstration was this: While the pattings, etc., were going on, I, being skeptical—as I am apt to be—bethought me to see if I could get a response to a mental request. So, as my cousin Joshua was understood to be there producing the raps, I mentally asked him to rap on the palm of my hand, unlike what we had had before, three distinctly measured times. Instantly my request was answered by three distinct, slowly repeated raps. These special raps could not but be convincing, since they were so unlike the others and given by mental request.

We hav here among us an uneducated man, a medium, who has done wonders in healing the sick, some, too, that were given up as hopeless cases by licensed allopaths. I hav seen him a good many times examin ailing persons without asking the patient a single question and put his finger on the exact locality of the pain. I hav proved him on my own person and know whereof I affirm. I could tell of many marvelous cases, told by himself, I admit, but corroborated and never denied by skeptics, so far as I know. He, the medium-doctor, was called to an adjacent town to see a sick child. Knocking at the door, the child's mother, weeping for her boy, came and said the doctor had just been there and said the child could not liv. Brushing the woman aside, the medium-doctor passed in, saying: "You needn't weep. I am come to cure your child." Putting his hand upon the child's forehead and breast, and manipulating a moment or two, the child seemed to revive, turned and went to sleep and from that moment began to recover and is a grown-up boy to-day. Another case: A young man of this town had been sick for some time and while the medium was getting ready to go to a lecture he was called in (the invalid was a near neighbor), but did not like to go, as the father of the sick one was belligerent toward him, the doctor. Almost determined not to go, he hesitated. Suddenly he found himself scampering toward the sick house, and even then, to avoid it, he turned into a house on the opposit side of the road and in entering fell prostrate. Recovering himself, he gave in, and taking the man of the house with him, entered the sick room. Supposing the young man was dying, the parents were in grief and tears. The doctor put his hand upon the forehead and bosom of the patient for a moment, rubbing a little, and the young man looked up, saying, "I am better." Turning upon his side he fell asleep. The doctor told them to let him sleep five hours and left. When he came from the lecture he went in to see him and found he had just awoke from sleep, was refreshed, and decidedly better. He rapidly recovered and is living now. The two cases are but a tithe of the many marvelous cures performed by or through this medium.

What is it? Is it the power of mind over matter? If so, then, as I said before, we are spirits now, and if so do, or do not, our individualized spirits fall back into the universal spirit ocean?

I do not ignore the philosopical ideas that hav been so ably presented through THE TRUTH SEEKER with regard to space being occupied by spirits, for certainly, according to cause and effect and a logical way of reasoning, eternity is long enough to fill every inch of space in our and all other solar systems, with spirit identities if they hav been eternally multiplying and need space. But we are at a loss as to the condition of the other life, if we continue to liv on, as are the caterpillars of the butterfly state. Spiritualists, I find, are apt to judge of things on the other side by the things and conditions of this life, but, if we liv at all as individuals, I apprehend we shall find a state of things of which we never dreamed. From my observations of nature, reason teaches me that the spirit of man at the death of the body dissolves, loses its identity, and mingles with the universal whole of spirit, similarly as does the body, which we know dissolves and enters into trees, plants, or air, or whatever else it gravitates to; but when phenomena steps in and offsets that idea with facts to the contrary, what are we to do, what can we do but acknowledge them?

If all the wonderful phenomena of Spiritualism can be accounted for as being all of this life, so be it; but meanwhile we await evidences. An honest, truthful, intellectual man believes upon evidence—[all men do, ED.] not because he desires to believe—belief is not optional—not a matter of choice; it must be, and is, founded on evidence to a thorough-going thinker. Christianity requires belief, evidence or no evidence. What contemptible folly! Spiritualists, many of them, require but slender evidence of the genuineness of the manifestations—do not care to test things. Hence unprincipled villains enter into the business of what they call Spiritualism for the sake of the money there is in it; therefore, if there be genuin Spiritual phenomena at all, it is relegated to the domain of frauds.

B. F. ROBBINS.

Teach the Bible in the Public Schools.

(CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.)

HAVANA, CUBA, July 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Now, these constitute the bulk of the laws of the "God" of the Bible; and will Rev. L. A. Banks, or Rev. A. C. Dixon, of the Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal church, Brooklyn, N. Y., please show which of those infamous commandments he can obey in the United States now, and not, if caught, go to prison for a long term of years, or be hanged for murder? In 1 John ii, 4, it provides that "He that saith I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." Those last ten words, in my opinion, involve the exact, full names of the above named Banks and Dixon; poor, posturing pigmies, who, bold like sheep, hav the stupendous audacity, the colossal effrontery, the monumental cheek, the acrimonious gall to attack the great champion of Rationalism, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, in the New York Herald, April 23, 24, p. 7, c. 2, and about June 6–94, and as a reply to whom I indite these lines.

Said Banks is reported to hav said: "A man who places the work which Thomas Paine did above the sublime patriotism and public service of George Washington, puts himself beyond the necessity of critical comment." I say, Yes! No slavemonger, who refused to draw his salary and giv it to the poor, if he did not need it, but left it in the treasury of the rich—the government—can ever be classed, in the forum of justice, virtue, and greatness, with such men as Thomas Paine and Lafayette, those two great Rationalists without whose help our revolutionary fathers could not hav succeeded. Washington was no Christian, if my quotation from 1 John ii, 4, is true; for he couldn't tell a lie, and he scoffed at Christianity by violating its commandments, as expressed in Rom. xiii. 1, 2; no matter if he did obey one of its holy statutes, by holding people in slavery—bondsmen—which Paine or Lafayette would not hav done—not for a seat at the right hand!

In the New York Herald, Dec. 7, 1885, or Jan., 1886, there was related the story of a thief, who attempted to take a coat of Rev. Dr. Talmage from the hallway of his residence in Brooklyn, N. Y.; that Mrs. Talmage had a violent tussle with the thief, and saved the coat. Now, the "God" of Mrs. Talmage, in Luke vi, 29, had commanded her thus: "Him that taketh away thy cloak, forbid not to take thy coat also."

To me, it is far more reasonable that an intelligent person is a poor hypocrit than that he, or she, can believe in Christianity, in view of all these facts. Besides, it is a trite old adage that "actions speak more plainly than do words." Yet in the captions of Matt. ix, Mark v, and Luke viii, they state that their Christ raised Jairus's daughter from death to life, and in verses 24, 39, and 52, respectivly, they hav made their Christ say, "The maid, [or damsel,] is not dead, but sleepeth." It is obvious that there is a mistake or misstatement here.

That omnipotent "God," who could hav done better, commanded us to hold slaves, murder, rob (conquest), and to do such vile things that rich men can do, but if the poor man hope to ever acquire wealth he must steal it; therefore, "Thou shalt not steal" (Ex. xx, 15). Now, poor dupe, do you not see why, and wherein, it is loaded?

Priests and preachers tell me that it is a duty to convince unbelievers, in anything, by doing that which one pretends to be able to do, as their Christ is said to hav done miracles to convince people as to his attributes, when at the same time he was omnipotent and, in a moment, could hav made all the world believe in him. But when I call upon them to prove that they veritably believe in their Christ by drinking a "deadly" dose which I will prepare for them—as in Mark xvi, 18, they hav made their Christ say they can do—they just wriggle out of it!

To prove conclusivly the truthfulness of the foregoing assertions, just reflect upon the condition of the Latin races under the Roman and Grecian mythology—with their gods, Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Mercury, Vulcan, Neptune, Pluto, and others, and their goddesses, Juno, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Vesta, and others—every word of which was false and, consequently, pernicious; but not so much so as is Christianity. Under that mythology those people had the entirety of Europe and the north of Africa under their flag. They were the greatest of sages, philosophers, generals, poets, statesmen, and orators of the world. Why, we teach with pride the orations of Cicero to our sons in our colleges at this late day! Had the Christians during the "dark ages"—Christian ages—not burned the great libraries of the ancients, because Christian rulers did not want learned and scientific men but obedient subjects, we would now be far in advance of what we are. But the moment that "Saint" Paul infected Rome with Christianity and the murderous villain, Constantine, who murdered his own mother and son, made it the religion of the state, Rome began to decline and has been going down ever since. England, being under the Roman flag, was also beset with the venomous malady and declined too, and four centuries ago Spain was in advance of England; but Henry VIII. woke her up somewhat. He would hav no foreign potentate, in the attitude of pope, to domineer over England. He poured into that bottle of Christian poison some Protestant water and diluted it about fifty per cent, and England shot ahead of Spain. But a lot of heretics—Lafayette, Paine, Franklin, Washington, and others—established the United States of North America and separated the church from the state completely, and in one century we hav made far more progress than hav all religion-befogged nations during all past ages. The steamship, the cotton gin, the lightning rod and electricity, the steam fire engin, the reaping and mowing machines, the sewing machine, the revolving pistol, the breech-loading gun, the metallic cartridge, the revolving turret for ships of war, the typewriter, the telegraph, the telephone, the phonograph, the threshing machine, the solid iron tire for wheels of vehicles, the Gatling and Hotchkiss guns, the street railway, the sleeping car, the pneumatic brake for cars, the screw-chuck for turning lathes, the corn planter, the artificial ice machine, the pin-making machine, the use of petroleum, the burglar alarm, the stamping and spinning of metals, the horse-twist drill, the roller-flouring mill, artificial teeth, India rubber goods, the gold pen, the fountain pen, and all the rest of the great inventions of the nineteenth century, excepting photography and electro-plating, are all our own. And where were the world to-day without them? And then there are Mormonism and Spiritualism—false, to be sure, but those systems of humbug hav served to lift some persons from the bogs of Christianity; and they can never retrogade, but drift right into Rationalism.

"Father, forgiv them, for they know not what they do," was not a good sentiment. Condign punishment, commensurate with justice, were far better. I am an unreconstructed Union man.

There is just one promis made by the omnipotent "God" of the Jews and Christians that he has fulfilled: In Ex. xxxiii, 23, he promised to show his "back parts," and I must concede that he has done it most effectually throughout the entirety of that Bible.

No honest, intelligent person can read the foregoing, and not concede, in mind, that it is truth.

Please observe that, to the degree that Christianity has been abolished or diluted, to that extent has been the increase of advancement in all countries not infested with some system of blackmail equally pernicious, and that the United States, having abolished nearly all of Christianity, is not a Christian nation.

Yes; teach the Bible in the public schools. But teach it.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

" Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"Little Dirty Face."

We hav a little maid at home,
She says, "My name is Dwace."
To pa and ma she's better known
As "Little Dirty Face."

You scrub and dress that child at ten—
White muslin trimmed with lace—
In fifteen minutes, often less,
She's Little Dirty Face.

But smiles oft break that crust of dirt,
And smiles the dimples chase.
And tender eyes light up with love
That little dirty face.

'Tis naught but superficial dirt,
Which scrubbing will erase.
So ma and pa are rather proud
Of Little Dirty Face.

On tot's small phiz the trouble is
To find a kissing place.
But, stay—I see a rosebud mouth
On Little Dirty Face.

Then come and giv that sweet "bear hug,"
Thou little toddling Grace.
Thy soul's as pure as angel's robes,
My Little Dirty Face.

The True Ambition.

And moving up from higher to higher,
Becomes on fortune's crowning slope
The pillar of a people's hope,
The center of a world's desire.
—Tennyson.

In every age since man's intellect has seen the light of day, with the strongest at all times succeeding, there has been a thirst for power and glory. In the breast of nearly every person rests the hope that on some bright day, at some happy hour, fame and honor will be achieved and the world will bow in admiration for the success thus attained. And many, many individuals pass through the gates of death hoping against hope, their wishes scattered to the winds, and their faith in this world amounting to a marvelous innocence. But such is the decree, that only a few—a favored few—will succeed, while the majority either fail or hold a common position in life. "The brave man may fail, but cannot yield."

I hav read somewhere the maxim—"Fortune favors fools." Is this really the case? I asked myself. Are the earnest and hopeful to be always doomed to disappointment, while the light-hearted and perhaps meaningless person wears the laurel of success? Can it be said that the great of all ages hav been fools, or did they achieve renown and admiration by the hardest of work and the self-denial, for the time being, of all pleasures? Look over the history of the world, especially the history of the times in which we liv; study carefully the lives of all those who are famous, and, after becoming acquainted with the hardships they endured, and the privations and disappointments overcome, ask yourself, Are they fools? No, they are the shining lights of this world. By their dazzling brightness they illumined the world, and lighted the pathway for those who would follow. Who, then, is the fool? 'Tis the person who dreams, always dreams, never tires dreaming, and is always hoping and dreaming that his dreams will turn out true. This is the fool. A person that dreams and hopes, but never does one single act to make his dreams a truth.

Hence the fool's paradise, the statesman's scheme,
The air-built castle, and the golden dream,
The maid's romantic wish, the chemist's flame,
And poet's vision of eternal fame.—Pope.

And now we will ask: What is ambition? Is there a good and false ambition, and can it be said it is separate from the false longings of the heart? Is it distinct from the boastful vaporings of the petty man? Or is it an inordinate desire for fame and wealth and power? Or is it something that defies analysis?

As we all should be aware, as vary the conditions of development, the environments, the inherited powers and conditions of mentality, so vary the hopes and aspirations of every individual in this universe. Go where we will, be where we may, this fact cannot escape our eyes. How often do the philosophic, the thoughtful, and studious minds feel shocked when they happen to hear a person say that his ambitions are for pleasure, the lowest at that. And what thoughts arise, when, in conversation over a serious subject, the opinion is expressed, "Oh, that's all right. Let everybody believe as they like. It is all opinion, and my opinion is as good as yours." Is it? Is the opinion of a frivolous person as good as the opinion of a thoughtful and studious person? It may be where ignorance prevails, but not in the sunshine of intellectual wealth and grandeur. And what is the reason of this dissimilarity? Why, the conditions of development and the environments in every case were different.

I once read a story of how a queen of France had a cat which she pampered and petted nearly every minute of the day, and had special food for it and special attendants to look after it. But the cat, in its loungings around the palace, found an entrance into the king's workshop, where, along with other cats, it managed to destroy several valuable pieces of work. One day the king came into the room suddenly while the cats were holding judgment over one of their number, and the worthy king, in his worthy rage, picked up a hammer, aimed it, and seriously injured his wife's favorit cat. The poor beast managed to find its way into the drawing-room, and the anger of the queen can be better imagined than described, and the poor old king came in for the worst scolding he ever had in his life. How much truth or fiction the story contains I do not pretend to know, but as such cases, where animals are petted and loved, while suffering humanity is neglected, can be found in our own aristocratic society, the question naturally arises: Should this be the ultimate object of one's life, and can we call such an absurdity an ambition?

By outward show, let's not be cheated,
An ass should like an ass be treated.—Gay.

Again, there are many whose sole happiness is frequenting a bar-room, having a proficient knowledge of billiards, and being able, very generally, to drink at another's expense. In every large city there are numberless examples of this class, and the youth of the city who spends his time in such a manner is sad to contemplate, and the number so doing is startling. Most of these young men are to be the men that make the future. They are to be the providers of homes, the caretakers of families, and the fathers of children. And the position of a bar-room lounger, after the day's work is over, is all that many such young men attain. Can this be called ambition?

Again, there is a class of people, orderly and of irreproachable character, who are satisfied with the position in life which they occupy. A good sustenance, a happy home, and plenty of legitimate pleasure—this is all they want. They liv and die; they perform no good deeds, but liv for themselvs. Their death is never a loss to the community, and the only words of regret to be heard are, "They were good and quiet people." Can this be called ambition?

Ideas of God.

From GEO. H. GIBSON, aged 18, Northville, Mich.

God is that conception of a mind by which that mind explains things, or some things, by causes other than those known or understood, or other than those thought to be known or understood, or other than those thought to be like those known or understood by that mind.

From BESSIE SCHAFFER, Philadelphia, Pa.

Definition of God, No. 2. God: An unknown quantity; an inferior quality, without shape, size, form, or body; it moves through all space without filling it; is less tangible than a shadow; more flexible than gum-elastic; its greatness is littleness; its power is weakness; its wisdom is foolishness. It is somewhere, anywhere, everywhere, and when wanted is nowhere. It is something, anything, everything, but in particular, nothing. It is Alpha and Omega—the first and the last; the beginning and the end; yet it never had a beginning, and will never hav an end. It is the author of nature, and yet no part of it; therefore a nonentity.

Correspondence.

LEE, N. D., Aug, 12, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and mamma thinks there is no other paper like it. I read the Corner every week. I do not want to be anything but a Freethinker. I am nine years old and go to school and study reading, writing, spelling, geography, arithmetic, and physiology. My sister Nellie wrote to the Corner some time ago. I will close now, hoping this will escape the waste basket. Your Liberal friend,

FORT STANTON, N. M., Aug. 12, 1894.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: I seat myself this morning to write to the Children's Corner. I love to read the little letters very much. I am thirteen years of age, and my birthday is May 1st. I am not going to school now, but I guess I will go this winter. Last winter we moved to Lincoln, which is about twenty miles from here, for school. I hav five brothers and three sisters, and I am the strongest Freethinker among us. My father is a true Freethinker. There is to be preaching here to-day. I like to go to church just to be going and sometimes to make fun after it is over. There was camp-meeting here about two weeks ago. I would like to hav that book, "Right Living." My father will giv me the money for it. He thinks it is a nice book, and I believe it is too. I would like to hav something nice, like that, to read. We would hav had a dance last night if the sky-pilot had not been at the place where it was to hav been held. Some of the people who had charge of it wanted to stand in with him, so they turned it into a singing party. Well, I would be ever so thankful for the book.

Your little Freethinking friend,

BERTHA MAY COE.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to liv. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

HEDGE-HOG PHILOSOPHY.

"Am Brudder Johnsing in de hall dis evenin'?" inquired the president of the Limekiln Club, as he rose and glanced up and down the aisles.

"He ar," promptly replied a voice from the region of the alley stairs.

"Den he will please step dis way."

Brother Johnson is nearly seven feet high, as thick as a corn-colored envelop, and makes a regular business of having three different kinds of asthma all at once. He slouched forward, dragging his long feet behind him, and when he reached the president's desk Brother Gardner said:

"Brudder Johnsing, I war ober to my fam'ly grocery de odder night to see if de price ob turnips had fell, an' yo' come in an' bought five p'nds of buckwheat flour an' a hunk o' codfish,"

"Yes, sah; I was dar," replied Mr. Johnson.

"Yo' was jest about to go when de ole man Climax come in fur a pint of 'lasses, an' it warn't two minntes befo' de two of yo' was disputin' 'bout how long ago the world was created."

"Yes, sah; but dat ole man hain't got no sense in his head."

"I heerd yo' call him a liar."

"But he done call me a fule."

"I heerd yo' call him a crank."

"But he done called me a humbug."

"Yes; I heerd it all; an' now I want to hev a leetle talk wid yo', Brudder Johnsing. How many y'ars ago was dis world created?"

"I duno, sah; but I reckon I knows as much as dat ole man Climax."

"Dat's probably true, but neither of yo' knows nuffin 'tall 'bout it. Dat's whar do trubble comes in. He said it was ten thousan' y'ars ole, an' yo' stuck to it dat it was a millyon. It's human natur' dat two intelligent pussons will sooner quarrel ober what dey doan know dan ober sunthin' dey kin be suah ob. What we doan' know we try to make up fur in argyment. What we lack in argyment we try to make up in blab. If we can't bring a man to see things as we do, we call him a fule."

"How does he know dis world am ten thousan' y'ars ole?" demanded Brother Johnson, with a show of spirit.

"How does yo' know it's a millyon?" blandly replied the president. "Mebee yo've got some later news dan de rest of us, but I doubt it. Let me say to yo' as follers:

"What yo' believes in wid all yo'r heart may be altogether wrong.

"De man who draps argument fur abuse admits dat he has got no case.

"De man who will admit his ignorance has a chance to learn wisdom; de man who won't must continyer to be a fule.

"Yo' may silunce a man by holdin' an ax above his head, but he doan' undergo no change of opinyon.

"De man who prides hisself on allus bein' right, makes brass take de place ob knowledge.

"It am only a fule who believes dat dis thing or dat thing am so bekase he has heerd hisself say so.

"Brudder Johnsing, when you stood dar, wavin' dat buckwheat flour in one hand an' de codfish in de odder, an' callin' dat ole man an idiot case he wouldn't add 990,000 y'ars to the age of de world to please yo', I was ashamed dat yo' belonged to dis club. When yo' went out an' dat grocery man axed me who dat umbrageous niggar was, I done make out dat I didn't hear the question, an' I felt so put out dat I forgot to enquar 'bout de turnips."

"I'm sorry," humbly replied Brother Johnson, as his knees wabbled under him. "If I meet dat ole man Climax again, I jest gwine to walk right by him and say nuffiin."

"I reckon yo' better, fur I tells yo' plainly dat yo' has cum powerful nigh gettin' bounced outer dis club. Yo' drap back dar by de stove an' sot down an' stay sot an' chaw de cud of reflecksun. De nex' time yo' meet a pusson who frows his arms around his head an' yells at de top of his voice dat he knows de exact age of de airth, you want to exhibit some sense in yo'r head."

"I will, sah."

"Yo' take yo'r buckwheat flour in one hand an' yo'r codfish in de odder an' slip right out an' git fur home an' leave him to talk to a box of clothes pins. On de way home you can console yo'self wid de reflecksun dat if de pa'r of yo' was to kick an' bite an' gouge an' pull ha'r an' tear up forty rods of sidewalk it wouldn't make the slightest difference 'bout de age ob de world. In my younger days I used to go aroun' declarin' dat no whale ebber swallowed Joner. I dind't see it done and so wouldn't believe it. One day I met a man who declar'd that de whale did swaller Joner. We argued an we hollered. We quarreled an' we fit. I broke his nose an' he split my ear, an' a policeman swallered us boaf, an' we got thirty days in de cooler. It am nuffin to me 'bout whales an' Joners. I don't care two shucks whether de world am fifty millyon or only two hundred y'rs old. If Cain killed Able, dat was all right; if he didn't, it was all de same. I could hev a fight 'bout such things ebery day in de week, but what good would it do? While I am discussin' Dan'l in de lion's den, de weeds are growin' in my tater patch, an' while I am punchin de head of de man who doan believe de story ob de Red Sea I miss two good jobs ob whitewashin'. Sot down, Brudder Johnsing, sot down, an' shet yo'r head, an' let de age of de world slide off yer back an' git lost among de pigweeds an' de thistles of de activ present. —M. Quad.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism. Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject with out mu h thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us , object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. e book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for s bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

Gems of Thought.

As long as man sees his ideal behind him he will discover no truth.—Investigator.

A man's time, when well husbanded, is like a cultivated field, of which a few acres produce more of what is useful to life than extensiv provinces, even of the richest soil, when overrun with weeds.—Hume.

Conscious of high aims and feeble powers, we must do our utmost to extend those powers and realize those aims, at the same time that we clearly recognize the limits which separate what is modifiable from what is unmodifiable—G. H. Lewes.

The man who givs his life for a principle has done more for his kind than he who discovers a new metal or names a new gas; for the great motors of the race are moral, not intellectual, and their force lies ready to the use of the poorest and weakest of us all.—Lowell.

Uncover its roots, and the theory of coerciv education will be found to grow not out of man's love of his offspring, but out of his love of dominion. Let anyone who doubts this listen to that common reprimand—"How dare you disobey me?" and then consider what the emphasis means. No, no, moral-force education is widely practicable even now parents were civilized enough to use! Herbert Spencer.

Religion has been a foe o liberty of discussion, thought, and action. She has denounced the state and now she panders to it. She has denounced education and now she adulterates it. She has denounced the press and now she uses it. She has denounced medicin and now she cannot do without it. The monumental labors of humanity, crystallized in the material and intellectual civilization of to-day, hav not been directed by religion, but by the blood of men who hav moistened the lives of priests, by the bodies of men who hav fattened their bodies, and by those whose bones are now burrowed by worms in their graves.—Stanley Jones.

The whole world is only a great concert, in which each one strikes his note and plays his part, and in which each one of us ought to be proud to add to the general harmony, and not to curse and hate those who labor in different spheres and with different aptitudes. I love to contemplate this magnificent union of every force which tends to bestow repose, prosperity, and greatness on my country; and I am deeply moved when I think of all that France could effect if all her children would utilize their own innate resources, and place them at the disposal of the public service and of their country—Archbishop Darboy (shot by the Communists).

The Israelites, a nation of sheep-feeders, had been for a considerable time in a hostil position toward the Egyptians, a nation of tillers of the ground. They were going to wander as sheep-feeders in the desert, and, at the first convenient time, they were to attack the Canaanites, a nation of tillers of the ground. It seemed desirable that they should hav some pretense for doing so; and one was found, in the belief that, from the earliest ages, the agriculturist had, when opportunity was favorable, oppressed the shepherd; and, therefore, at any time, the shepherd tribe was entitled to revenge itself on any agricultural tribe.—Sir G. B. Airy, on the Myth of Cain and Abel.

The ascetic who teaches us to despise happiness and exalt self-sacrifice has no reason to giv us for the asceticism he practices save the hedonist reason that, in his opinion, it will result in the long run in a surplus of pleasure. And his opinion is mistaken; that is all the difference. Once induce him to believe and understand that the universe is not governed by an omnipotent fiend who "sends yin to heaven and ten to hell a' for his glory"—and he ceases to be an ascetic; he becomes a hedonist. Do we not know it well, all we of the new faith, who were nourished in the old, and abandoned it perforce when we found it at last wholly lacking in historic, philosophic, and ethical basis?—Grant Allen.

All social philosophy belongs to self strength. Any act which beggars another offends truth. Any act which is not in the direction of the extinguishment of dependency is traitorous to social health. The structure is weakened at the foundations. Effort which does not aim at and culminate in individual independence and power, whatever its motiv, is base and destructiv. The asides in this great drama are the pitiful sermons of priests and philanthropists who apologize in palliativs for present evils and who drink at no fountain of brave and absolute conviction. They are the mere accidents and ephemera of the play. They enter and cross the stage, but are not essential to the plot.—Horace L. Traubel.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By George J. Romanes.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. THE most awful forest fire of the year occurred in eastern Minnesota on September 1 and 2. Six towns—Hinckley, Sandstone, Pokegama, Sandstone Junction, Skunk Lake, and Mission Creek—were wiped out, and at least 500 lives were lost. It is probable that when all the returns are in from the back country districts the list of dead will be greatly lengthened. One train carrying a large number of passengers was burned, but most of the passengers saved themselvs in the water and mud of Skunk Lake, the engineer having backed his train from near Hinckley, although he was badly burned as he stood in his cab, and the cars were on fire in a dozen places. Relief for the destitute is being hurried forward from Minneapolis, St. Paul, Duluth, and other cities. The property loss foots up into the millions of dollars.

A Journal of Freethought and Reform.

Vol. 21. No. 37 {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, September 15, 1894. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 Per Year.

A FACT WHICH MUST HORRIFY THE GHOST OF PURITANISM.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies nearly all adjourned, but the people of the country remained in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the fund and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

The New York Advertiser, commending the action of the Constitutional Convention in adopting a proposed amendment against appropriations for sectarian schools, observes:

"The plain truth of the matter is that churches and church societies are no more entitled to special consideration at the hands of the government than any other organization. A church edifice should be taxed just as well as a gymnasium or a club. The members of each of these organizations support them by voluntary contributions, and there is no just cause for any of them to dodge their pecuniary obligations to the state. Sentimentalists may cry out against this view of the case, but they cannot present any arguments to controvert it that will stand the searchlight of logic and common sense."

The trouble is that the Constitutional Convention has not yet done any thorough work. Theists and Protestants can drive a herd of Texas steers through its school amendment without touching an effectiv prohibition anywhere.

The Constitutional Convention and the Schools.

As our readers are aware, the New York Constitutional Convention's Committee on Education reported a proposed amendment which, if adopted by the Convention and ratified by the people, would stop all appropriations to Catholic parochial and the strictly denominational schools of Protestant sects, and would also prevent the teaching of distinctivly Catholic doctrins in the common schools, but would not prevent appropriations to schools, not under the control of any one denomination, in which fundamental Theistic and Christian dogmas are inculcated, and would not take the Bible out of the public schools nor prevent religious services therein if those services did not traverse doctrins held in common by Protestant and Catholic. Neither would it operate to keep the public schools clear of text-books permeated with the basic teachings of Christianity and Theism.

A very animated debate took place when the embryo amendment was considered by the Convention in Committee of the Whole. The Democrats were a unit against the proposed amendment, while the Republicans were split into two factions, one led by Elihu Root, in favor of the amendment as reported, and the other, under the leadership of Owen Cassidy, desirous of materially modifying the Educational Committee's proposition. The Committee of the Whole first killed these three proposed amendments of the amendment: That of Mr. Forbes, "providing that the section forbidding the use of public money for sectarian schools shall not apply to orphan asylums or institutions for the care of dependent persons under sixteen years old; second, that of Mr. Lauterbach, providing that the sectarian section shall not apply to orphan asylums or correctional institutions in which education is incidental only; third, that of Mr. Marshall, authorizing the appropriation of public money for secular instruction in orphan asylums and reformatories." Then came Mr. Cassidy's amendment, forbidding the use of public money for any "school or institution not wholly owned and controlled by the state or a sub division thereof." At the first glance it would seem that this was a more drastic and comprehensiv measure than the amendment reported by the Committee on Education. It would appear to cut off appropriations to all denominational schools and to all other schools except the public schools and the higher institutions of learning under state control. And more than this, it would not seem to be possible to giv any public money to private and denominational charitable institutions should this provision become part of the organic law of the state. However, the Republican leaders thought otherwise, and proceeded to retire the Cassidy proposition to temporary oblivion, after a stubborn fight.

Mr. Cassidy's amendment to the amendment was accepted by the Committee of the Whole, which then, by the vote of 68 to 59, rose and reported the amendment as amended to the Convention, with the recommendation that it pass. Then Mr. Root moved that the Convention disagree with the report of the Committee of the Whole, and that "the educational article be recommitted to the Committee on Education, with instructions to report the original proposition." What Mr. Root and his friends thought is told by the Times in these words:

"The Republican leaders had distrusted the Cassidy amendment from the first. They saw in it opportunities for sectarian schools in counties and cities to put themselvs on the visiting list of the state Board of Charities, and thus to derive benefit from state funds, the very object which the Committee on Education and the prominent members of the Convention, irrespectiv of politics and religion, apparently, were attempting to frustrate."

Mr. Root moved the previous question on his motion to recommit, and was sustained by the house. The roll call occupied two hours, and half of the delegates explained their votes. Again we quote from the Times' report:

"Mr. Holls said that the effect of Mr. Cassidy's amendment would be to authorize local option in sectarian teaching, with the aid of state funds. The full scope of the amendment was not explained, many of the delegates thinking that it would forbid all sectarian teaching whatever. Mr. Root made the following remarks: 'I made the motion which I did make because I know that the amendment proposed by Mr. Cassidy does not accomplish what the Convention desires to accomplish, the separation of church and state, which is accomplished by the report of the committee; because I know that it is being supported here by those who do not wish any amendment to be adopted, by those who hav their little petty interests in their own homes, for which they wish to secure state aid. It has been asserted that this is a blow at religion, insincerely by most of those who hav made the charge; on the contrary, the separation of church and state will be an aid to religion.'"

Elihu Root should not need to be told that the original amendment did not secure the separation of church and state, its only effect being to prevent the teaching of denominational tenets at state expense, leaving the way wide open for governmental support of undenominational religion. As to the real meaning of the Cassidy amendment, Mr. Choate said:

"Mr. Cassidy's amendment sounds very well. It is calculated to mislead the unwary, and it has evidently misled a number of unwary delegates. Stripped of all its concealments, the amendment is nothing more or less than local option for the rankest kind of sectarianism. In Poughkeepsie sectarian schools are receiving public money as public schools. The entering wedge has been driven to that extent, and has aroused the alarm of the people, who desire no more of it. There are those—I am not one of them—who believe that a great foreign hierarchy is trying to extend its influence over the schools of this state. This amendment will open the door to such influence. If it is done with the schools of Poughkeepsie, it can be done in New York and Brooklyn. The people of the state will not tolerate this. The effect of the amendment will make interference with our schools forever possible, and I, for one, am opposed to it."

Seventy-one delegates, all Republicans, voted to recommit, and sixty-eight, of whom fourteen were Republicans, voted nay. Among the latter was B. S. Dean, who early in the session submitted an overture for an amendment taxing all private property, and Mr. Lauterbach, who was anxious to secure something to pay for "incidental" education in charitable institutions. Mr. Root now moved that the article be sent to third reading, and the minority demanded the yeas and nays. More explanations of votes followed. Mr. Cassidy said:

"From this time on I shall know no rest in opposing the work of this Convention. I shall never giv my vote or my voice to a provision which I believe goes back two hundred years to the days of religious persecution. We are making of the state a hound to hunt with the dogs who are after sectarian game."

However much we must be opposed to Mr. Cassidy's amendment, as interpreted by the majority of his associates, we cannot help thinking that he tells the truth in the last sentence of his speech. What he there expresses has been our contention all along. We hav yet to see the slightest evidence of a desire in the Convention to secure the complete divorce of church and state in the matter of education.

Mr. Lauterbach again said that no provision had been made for "the instruction of inmates of orphan asylums and reformatories, and he hoped the Convention would be unanimous in making such provision in the charities article." Mr. Powell said that in his opinion "the people would hav something to say when they learned that the reading of the New Testament had been forbidden in the schools." Of what is Mr. Powell talking? Where is the reading in the public schools of either the New or the Old Testament forbidden? We wish it were, but it is not, as any person with the slightest powers of analysis can see. The gates are swung wide for non-denominational teaching. The purpose of Dr. King and his confrères was to deal the Catholic schools a knock-out blow while retaining the Bible and providing for the inculcation of the general principles of Christianity in the public schools. They are astute politicians, and hav what they want. We again print Section 4 of the educational article:

"Neither the state nor any subdivision thereof shall use its property or credit or any public moneys, or authorize or permit either to be used, directly or indirectly, in aid or maintenance, other than for examination or inspection, of any school or institution of learning, wholly or in part under the control or direction of any religious denomination, or in which any denominational tenet or doctrin is taught."

According to the Times, the Democrats in the Convention hold that "the present article is not severe or drastic enough; that a coach and four and a limited express train can be driven through it without injury to either." Or to the article itself, they could hav added with equal truth. "If the Republicans are really sincere in their protestations," a leading Republican lawyer, a member of the Convention, is reported as saying, "why don't they adopt such an amendment as this:

"Neither the funds of the state nor any subdivision shall be used for the support or maintenance of any parochial, sectarian, or denominational school."

That is another sham. In fact, it is less inclusiv, if anything, than the amendment adopted. It touches no school, public or private, in which only the underlying principles of Theism and Christianity are taught. Here is the only form of amendment that would cover the whole ground and actually debar all state aid for the teaching of religious dogmas:

"Neither the state nor any subdivision thereof shall use its property or credit or any public money, or authorize or permit either to be used, directly or indirectly, in aid or maintenance of schools or other institutions of learning wholly or in part under the direction or control of any religious denomination or combination or family of denominations, or in which any religious or anti-religious tenet or doctrin is taught."

We hav here referred, contrary to our usual custom, to certain political organizations, not to attack any, but because it is apparent that the delegates in the Constitutional Convention hav permitted their action in regard to state support of religious education to be determined, to a greater or less extent, by what they hav hoped or feared would be the effect of their speeches and votes upon the issue of the fall elections.

God's Loving Providence.

The horrible disaster in the Northwest, and especially in Minnesota, ought to open the eyes of even the most credulous believers in the doctrin of a loving providence to the utter foolishness of the notion that we are under the care of a heavenly father, who numbers the hairs of our heads and holds us tenderly in the hollow of his hand. The awful death that fell upon the five hundred human beings and the tens of thousands of domestic and wild animals, might easily hav been sent by a being endowed with the attributes which the Christian givs to the devil of his theology. There was in neither the terrible event itself nor any of its attendant circumstances the least thing to remind one of the loving solicitude which a finite earthly parent would manifest for his children, nor a trace of the protection which he would extend to them if within his power, saying nothing of the illimitable love which we are told animates "our heavenly father" and the absolute protection which it is asserted it is within his power to bestow.

Telegraph operators, engineers, firemen, conductors, all stood at their posts and saved hundreds of lives. Mothers perished vainly striving to shield their babes; children went to agonizing death in the vain attempt to rescue their parents; husbands and wives and lovers did heroic deeds for their loved ones' sakes; men bore their comrades out of that forest hell; young boys guarded baby brothers and sisters; God—did nothing.

Dr. Lewis, of Mora, labored for seventy-two hours in caring for the tortured victims of the flames, succumbing only when his medicins gave out and he could stand no longer. A boy of fourteen dragged two smaller children for miles from the burned train to a spot where they were found. A lover carried his sick betrothed for a mile through the burning woods on his back to a place of safety, while unencumbered companions lay down to die, so terrible was the heat. A man bore a crippled brother out of that God-lighted inferno. Another man, with one eye burned out, and the other almost sightless, carried on his shoulders a neighbor whose feet were melted away. A daughter stayed by the bedside of a sick mother who could not be moved and had to be forcibly torn away to save her from the fate that overtook her parent. "There were dozens of men whose positions in death, as it instantaneously seized them, showed that they were hastening with all speed into the very face of flames, to the rescue of loved ones." Thirty bodies were found along the line of the Duluth road, lying with the heads to the northwest, as they had fallen in flight. The World's reporter says of these:

"The women's bodies spoke eloquently of mother's love. Each had a child, some had two, one had five, clasped and sheltered within their poor, burned arms. One mother had absolutely stripped herself of her raiment, wrapped her two babes in it, dug a hole in the ground with her hands, placed her darlings in it, and then calmly lain down over them, yielding her life for a possible chance of saving theirs; but her self-sacrifice was in vain, but not absolutely so, for the babes died of suffocation, and by their features the identity of the heroic mother was learned."

That tells what mothers do for their children; what "God" does for his is told by the five hundred charred and distorted corpses sepulchered last week in rough pine boxes in the Minnesota forests. And by another hundred or more in the woods of Michigan.

We here speak of this "God" as though he were an actual existence, for so Christian Theism postulates him, an all-knowing, all-powerful personality, hearing and answering prayer. But it is all a dream. We know nothing of him, expect nothing from him. Nature is the all-in-all. She, in the aggregate, feels not, thinks not, previses not, is thrilled by neither love nor hate, remorse nor fear, tenderness nor cruelty, revenge nor mercy. If we work in harmony with her inexorable laws we may liv, for even four score or more years, lives of mingled pleasure and pain, sweetness and bitterness. But all must ultimately yield to the law of decay, which is the other side of that of growth.

Let the God superstition go.

Some Mistakes About the Two Wings.

We hav recently read the statement that the Protestant churches, unlike the Catholic, do not dictate what their members shall read. This is an error. They do all they can to keep progressiv works out of the hands of their people. Themselvs rebels against ecclesiastical tyranny, they cannot speak with the authority that the mother church commands, but that which they possess they exert, as all know who hav tried to get Freethought books and works on evolution into public libraries. The "Age of Reason" was long under the ban of American Protestants to such an extent that it was almost impossible in thousands of neighborhoods to keep a copy of it in circulation. Every colporteur of Liberal books knows that it would be impossible even to-day to leave a copy of that work, as a gift, in any one of the vast majority of the homes of Protestants in the United States. And what is true of the "Age of Reason" is true of other Infidel books. Our men and women in the field can giv any number of instances where the Protestant wives of Freethinkers will not permit their husbands to take Liberal papers or hav Freethought books in their houses. And this intolerance of the women is, of course, encouraged and applauded by their pastors. The Salvation Army has a "novel burning day," on which the works of some of the best writers of fiction are reduced to ashes, along with those of some of the poorest. Many of the Presbyterian churches disciplin their members if they are known to read Sunday papers, while the whole theocratic army, almost entirely Protestant, is calling for laws to prohibit the publication of papers on Sunday. And then there are the nationa statutes which establish a censorship over the mails. In fact, the difference between the Catholic and the Protestant in this regard, as in most others, is one of degree only.

We are also told that "the Protestants are persuaded to support their churches; the Catholics are forced to." The leaders of all churches make use of ecclesiastical terrors to draw generous contributions from their adherents. The more superstitious the subject, the more readily such influences act. We know even Atheists who are deacons in Protestant churches, and many, many more Liberals who giv money and moral support to churches in whose dogmas they hav no faith. Why do they do this? Some because their wives demand it; others because they seek political preferment; others because they are in business; others because they want clients or patients or employment, but all because they hav been led to believe that these Protestants will boycott them in some way if they do not help the church. We hav been informed by persons in whose word we hav full confidence that they hav known woman solicitors for Protestant churches who threatened business men that if they did not giv them money they would see to it that the members of their church withdrew their patronage from these merchants, and we know that such threats are very often implied when not boldly expressed. How often the man of business or the doctor or lawyer is told when he moves into town that it will be greatly to his pecuniary advantage if he will ally himself with this, that, or the other church!

It is difficult to see wherein men who succumb to such pressure are in a lesser degree "forced" to support the Protestant churches than "servant girls in American families" are forced to support the Catholic. The "persuasion" in both these cases is essentially the same. If "American citizens" and "servant girls" and politicians and men of business allow themselvs to be fleeced in such ways the loss is primarily their own. It is not our business to try to save them by law. If we make the attempt we shall be, in purpose, as great "despots" as those whose spiritual domination we so loathe, and we shall fail in our crusade, for men can alone save themselvs from mental servitude.

When we declare that "no foreign priest should be permitted to liv on American soil, and to this complexion will it come at last," we confess that we fear the thoughts and moral influence of that priest to such a degree that we dare not meet him in fair and open encounter. Why should the Freethinker talk of proscription as something excellent to the taste and nourishing to the body? Why should he fear to set truth and justice against the world? Does he believe that the Protestants and Freethinkers of the United States cannot, if they wish, make and maintain this a secular republic without expatriating Catholic priests? If we play the tyrant together against the Catholic will not the strongest faction left be thereby stimulated to play the despot over some weaker division? Unjust power grows by example and opportunity. Let us, as Freethinkers and as men and women of good sense, do nothing that will giv it either. Stand for the wholly secular state, fully persuaded that we cannot secure justice for ourselvs by denying it to others. Liberty is no less a means than an end.

It seems to be abundantly demonstrated either that the most meddlesome boys study for the ministry, or studying for the ministry makes good boys meddlesome.

We observe that Rev. E. Thompson, D.D., of Los Angeles, California, classes Elder A. T. Jones, the Adventist, with S. P. Putnam among the "leaders of anti-Christian thought." Why is Mr. Jones thus shut out of the fold he loves so well? Because he has the temerity to assert, and prove, that religion and the state should be kept separate. This is his offense, and this makes him a "leader of anti-Christian thought" in the estimation of the National Reformers. They cannot conceive of Christianity as something apart from the political machine. And yet they talk about "religious liberty."

Among the distinguished Freethinkers of the world who hav died within the last few months should be mentioned D. Santos la Hoz, of Spain; Dr. Edward Schwella, president of the Free Religious societies of Austria, aged seventy-one; Ludwig Pfaus, German poet, art critic, and philosopher, aged seventy-three; Louis Lamborelle, of Belgium; Pierre Joseph Maheu, prominent Belgian labor-leader and printer of La Raison, and Louis Lepoutre, lawyer, member of the House of Representativs, and founder of the Freethought societies of Brussels and Ixelles, of Belgium.

Even the "lower animals" were more watchful of human lives in Minnesota than was "God." A white spaniel was found in the gutter of a street in Hinckley guarding the remains of a baby carriage, and a few scattered toys. The house was in ashes and his people burned almost beyond recognition. He was taken to Pine City, fourteen miles away, but returned to his lonely vigil at once. A horse was found beside the body of his dead master. The horse had a saddle on, his eyes were out and his feet off, but he gave every evidence of knowing that his master was there and cried out piteously when the body was taken away for burial. What was "God" doing, and was the poor horse thus tortured because of Adam's "transgression"?

Emperor William of Germany said in a speech at the unveiling of the statue of his grandfather at Königsberg:

"This is the spot where King William openly declared that he held his crown as the gift of God alone. My own deepest conviction is expressed in this declaration, which has ever served to guide all my actions."

Our American theocrats should be greatly cheered by such distinguished testimony to the truth of their claim that all rightful government is from God. It is somewhat singular, however. that William makes this assertion of the divine prerogativ of the emperor tell against the only lesser divine prerogativ of the East Prussian nobility, whose schemes he is so vigorously antagonizing. Can God fight against himself?

Christian missionaries hav a pretty good-sized job before them in the attempted conversion of the "heathen." To bring into the fold only the 40,000,000 of Japan's inhabitants is likely to prove no small task. When the body of Otani Kosho, ex chief abbot of Hong Wau temple, was incinerated at Kioto, there were 10,000 persons in the funeral cortége and 150,000 reviewed the proc ssion. Among these were included members of the royal family, peers, leading officials of the locality, and other distinguished people. The display cost $100,000, and was paid for by popular subscription. In this age of criticism and science all systems of theology are much more likely to be materially modified if not supplanted by Rationalism than any one system of supernaturalism is to drive out the others or any of them.

In actual and deadly peril the praying instinct seems unable to strongly assert itself. The World has sent Nellie Bly to the scene of the Minnesota horror and here are her reports of her conversations with two of the survivors:

"Said Hans Paulson in answer to a question: 'Pray? No; I didn't think of it. I thought it was death, but I didn't think of the hereafter.' Poor Paulson had lost his entire family. A mother was telling of her escape. Her eldest boy stood near, listening. 'Did you say your prayers?' I asked again. 'No, I forgot them. I was busy taking care of the baby.'"

Taking care of the baby! That was well said and better done. Forgot to pray and acted. How many babies did "God" save?

Miss Bly, writing from Pine City, Minnesota, says: "I hav heard of only two who, in the face of death, remembered to pray. They were women of unspeakable reputations." But they were alone and had no loved ones to care for; pressing work sends prayer to the rear. And why should not such pray, and why should Christians reject them?

The Florida Baptist Witness wants to know who would wish to liv in a city, no matter how attractiv in appearance, where the water is bad and the ground barren. Then it spreads its hypothetical city out until it becomes the "Land of Unbelief," and says that it may be a very goodly country at first sight, but the pilgrim will find that the waters which flow through it "make it a very unhealthy place of residence" "in which to bring up the children of his mind." But it so happens that the children (thoughts) of the minds of those who dwell in this land of unbelief in fables and miracles are more than usually well-proportioned and vigorous, in spite of the alleged bad quality of the water. In every age they hav been the children to whom has been given the future as an inheritance

United States Attorney General Richard Olney is popularly supposed to need considerable urging to induce him to take hold of any particular piece of work, and it is probable that the case of J. B. Wise will be no exception to the rule. So it will not be amiss for the Freethought Letter Writing Corps to again present to him some sound reasons why the indictment against Mr. Wise should be dismissed. Write this week and put your arguments against this persecution in a new light, with force, suavity, and directness. This suit is entered for trial in October, and all should act promptly. We hav received these additional contributions to the wise Defense Fund: George L. Pratt, $1; John McCrory, $1; J. W. Miller, $1; John T. Lakin, $1; Wm. Hodgson, $1; James Yates, 50 cents; A. H. Chandler, $1; F. D. Rexford, $1; D. M. Worley, $1; Silas B. Latham, $5.

Mr. Putnam was so busy two weeks ago in his work in behalf of the Secular Congress that he did not send in any "News and Notes" for last week's THE TRUTH SEEKER. He should not do this way often, for the readers of this paper do not like to be deprived of the weekly treat to which he has accustomed them. "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is on the ways and will soon be launched. Its author will be as glad to see it as will the subscribers. Six dollars and fifty cents will still secure the monumental work, and THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. And the names of the subscribers will be printed in the book. The cost of "Four Hundred Years" is $5, when taken alone. The names given below hav been received since last acknowledgment was made: B. A. Shaw, Illinois; Calvin J. Wright, Nebraska; Mr. and Mrs. L. A. Kapla, New York; John J. Riser, California; David Wittenberg, Oregon; Robert Watkin, British Columbia.

The Brooklyn Eagle, referring to the contention that voting is a duty, and the resulting proposition that all qualified electors should be compelled to vote at each election, remarks:

"It is a question whether compulsory voting is consistent with free institutions and the spirit of a free people. If voting be a duty, it is a duty to be performed under conviction and not by compulsion. Many good people regard it a duty not to vote, believing that they can most effectivly and patriotically exercise their rights as citizens by refusing to vote. We cannot see as they do, but voting should not be made mandatory or forced upon them."

The Covenanter Christian Reformer quotes the observations of the Eagle without adverse comment, although the doctrin is rank heresy from the theocratic point of view. The Reformer's seeming acquiescence is doubtless due to the fact that the Covenanters do not vote—or, at least, one wing of that church still stands on the old ground—and a compulsory voting law would force them to take a big dose of their own bitter medicin. They all hold that Sunday observance is a duty, and a duty to be performed under compulsion when not performed under conviction. It would be unjust to compel the Covenanter to vote, but it is precisely as unjust for the Covenanter to compel others to observe Sunday by abstaining from work or recreation. We hope the Reformer can see the point.

The Baptist Witness observes that "Reason," the capital city of the "Land of Unbelief," is a veritable siren. Listen:

"It is full of pretentious buildings, and has some streets which make a very inviting showing of handsome residences, with lawns which promis much freedom from crowding, but death has a bedroom in every cellar."

It also says that what makes it so dangerous is its bad water supply or supply of bad water. We suppose the Witness means that it is eternal death that has so many basement sleeping apartments in the city of Reason, but we should apprehend that such unsalubrious quarters would undermine the health of Mr. Eternal Death, and eventually cause his demise, for it is very unwholesome to sleep in the cellar. If there is anything which your old style, true blue theologian is sure is detrimental to the prospects of the soul it is a tolerably activ and inquiring brain. With him reason is only another name for the devil. This probably fairly good man, with whose odd and antique superstitions we are amusing ourselvs for a moment, has also a horror of "the city of Salvation by Works," which he says is "another metropolis in which thousands die every year from poisoned water and malaria." In this view of the case, we do not see what Christians mean by putting forward the claim that Christianity has been the great factor in the moral, intellectual, and material development of humanity. If good works are such efficient recruiting sergeants for hell, the less we hav of them the better, and as good works increase as the moral standard is elevated, it follows that if it be true that Christianity has done so much to elevate morals, that system of religion is responsible for the eternal damnation of uncounted billions of wretches, who hav gone to hell overburdened with good deeds.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has never failed to maintain that the word "unsectarian," when used by aggressiv Protestant anti-Catholics to describe the kind of education they favor, is utterly misleading, unless one understands the verbal trick. In the mouths of these people, "unsectarian" means either Protestant or Christian. Here is the New York Evangelist, which represents the "liberal" or Briggs wing of Northern Presbyterianism, and which, in commenting on the recent decision of Judge Barker, of Pennsylvania, in the nun school teacher case, lets the whole secret out frankly and unreservedly. It says:

"Unquestionably no religious instruction should be given in our public schools which can in any way be properly called sectarian. But is this to say that no religious instruction should be given? Very far from that. The fundamental fact of humanity is its relation to God. If it is necessary that our children shall be taught ethics so far as their relations to themselvs and their neighbor are concerned, and patriotism for the sake of their relation to the state, far more is it necessary that they shall be taught the essential facts of religion. But why should we quarrel about it? There are certain religious doctrins that all Christian people hold in common, and these are the doctrins most important for the purposes of our schools. Why should not representativs of all churches agree on a system of religious instruction that will wrong none of them? It ought not to be so difficult a matter."

Certainly it should not be difficult; the New York Constitutional Convention has very nearly solved the problem in the amendment it has voted to submit to the people. Of course the Catholics are protesting against it, but that is because they wanted separate state-aided schools to balance the Protestant control of the public schools. But the amendment will, if ratified, permit the teaching in the public schools of those "certain religious doctrins that all Christians hold in common," those doctrins being the "most important" for school purposes. Note how coolly the Evangelist proposes the appropriation by the Christians of the public schools, utterly regardless of the rights of non-Christians! Yet Dr. Field's paper openly demands no more than every one of the "patriotic" orders is laboring to secure, that is, "unsectarian" Christian public schools.

A Lesson for Mr. Hays.—Concluded.

The tariff scheme was tried on old Mother Eve, and did not work worth a cent. She was a liberty-loving woman and a free trader. She dealt in apples and kicked clear over all tariff walls. What a world of ignorance we should hav lived in if she had not proved such a high kicker! And now Mr. Hays is making up a rueful face because Mother Eve had sagacity enough to see the fallacy of the tariff. Now let us build a tariff wall around Mr. Hays' little Locust Corner, and say to the capitalists of the country and the world, "Come to Locust Corner and put up forges and build mills and factories; we propose to hav a little world of our own and liv within ourselvs, and we will protect you with a tariff which will shut out foreign competition, so that the people will be compelled to buy your products, and you can bleed them with high prices which will prove remunerativ. And then, because you get such high prices for your products, you can pay a high price for raw material and for farmers' produce. And because the farmer gets such a high price for his produce he can pay his hired men high wages, and the operativs in the workshops and factories can get such wages as are nowhere else paid in the world, because the output of the factories is sold for higher rates than can be obtained anywhere else in the world. And because this little community want to use all manner of commodities they must foster and encourage all manner of industries. But while these industries are protected with such scrupulous care, the gates are opened to all the laborers of the world. Then, as this community is isolated from the rest of the world, there must be a government and officers. And inasmuch as all receive such enormous compensation for all that is produced and performed, these officers must receive extra compensation for their services." Here are the principles and workings of the tariff in a nutshell. Let us analyze them.

In the first place, how can the manufacturers obtain this extra reward for their products, except by a high-price tax-levy upon the people? And how can the man who furnished the raw material get a higher price unless he draws it from the manufacturers? And how can the farmer get a higher price for his produce unless he draws it from the manufacturers and the laborers? How can the farm hand get higher wages unless he draws them from the farmer? Now we come to the operativs and the common laborers—those who stand on the lowest round of the social ladder. They are surrounded with a network of circumstances which compel them to pay a higher price for everything which they consume, so that the higher rate of wages is swallowed up by the higher prices of all things they are compelled to use.

Then, as the tax on the few goods which are admitted from the outside world is not sufficient to defray the expenses of the government, a tax is levied upon certain articles produced, which is known as an internal revenue tax. And as these taxes are paid only through increased prices, the people uncomplainingly submit to the burden.

Then to encourage manufactures which could not be made to pay, they are propped up with bounties, which are raised by this unnatural system of taxation.

And as these taxes are levied according to what each one consumes, and as there are a hundred poor men to one rich one, and as the hundred will consume many times as much as the one rich man, the great burden of taxation is laid upon the shoulders of the poor.

As those who are so highly favored by this tax grow rich and fat they become deeply interested in the welfare of the workingman. And they bring out their long guns and burn a great deal of powder, and waste a great many wads, and there is a great jingle of brass and flourish of trumpets, to make the wage-earners understand that they (the bosses) are their true friends, and that if it were not for the tariff they could not giv them employment, and they would be turned out to beg or starve.

Now let us see the practical working of this sympathy.

A Chinaman, who livs on rats and puppies and garbage, comes along and offers to work for the farmer for two shillings a day. So the farmer says to the hired man, "I can't pay you a dollar a day, when I can hire a man of equal muscle for two shillings a day." So the hired man steps down and out.

Well, they rush in from Italy and Norway and the four quarters of the globe, everything which "divideth the hoof and cheweth the cud," and they fill the factories and workshops at half price, and the American laborer has to liv upon the crumbs which he can pick up, and that is the way the tariff has helped the workingman of America. The laborer has nothing to put upon the market but his labor, and, therefore, can derive but little benefit from tariff taxes. Though the price of American labor has been reduced nearly one-half by the influx of foreign labor, yet these tyrannical, grasping, over-reaching bosses and barons are still clamoring for tariff protection.

Having established a high protectiv government at "Locust Corner," we propose to establish a free trade government at Naples, and then compare results.

In establishing a free trade government the strictest rules of economy are to be observed. No expenses are to be incurred not demanded by the public good. Hence the millions of dollars spent in building custom houses and offices will be saved to the people. Other millions paid to custom officers will also be saved, as no offices will be created save those required by the highest interests of the people. The expenses of the government will be defrayed by a direct tax laid upon the people according to their wealth and ability to pay, and not according to what they are compelled to consume. The rich cannot shift the burdens which they ought to bear upon those least able to sustain them.

No encouragement to manufactories or industries of any kind, except that which is received from the people by the purchase of what they (the manufacturers) produce. If an industry cannot be sustained by the demand for what is produced, it can be run only at a loss to the people, and the labor had better be turned into a more renumerativ channel.

Horace Greeley had an idea that tea could be cultivated in this country with a little encouragement, and cited the fact that Chinamen carried the tea long distances on their backs to the coast, and that we had to pay for that service when we bought the tea. Let the Chinaman carry the tea; we can not afford to fool away our time in that way. We can beat the world making clocks and watches, and as long as we can trade them for tea, that is the cheapest way to get it.

Call off your tariff dogs—kick down all protection walls—open up relations with all nations and proclaim to the world that we propose to giv and receive favors—that our markets are open, and that the people are the best judges as to what they want to buy. We want the whole world to trade in, and we propose to take our products where the best prices can be obtained, and buy where we can get what we want at the cheapest rate.

The idea that foreigners will flood us with their goods is childishly foolish. They can no more flood us than we can flood them. The wants of the country will prove the limit to the flooding. They can no more force their goods upon us than we can force our goods upon them. They will bring no more goods than they can sell, and they can sell no more than we want to buy.

Important industries will not be swept away by taxes laid on raw material. Labor and industries will be neither helped nor hindered. It will be a free-for-all race in which brains and business tact, inventiv genius and push and pluck will win.

Those who hav invested in Nova Scotia mines are crying for free coal and iron. Those who own mines here cry out for protection.

A few years ago a Dutch vessel sailed into Boston harbor with copper on board to resheathe the vessel. But when the master of the vessel found that he had to pay forty per cent on the new copper, and four cents a pound for the privilege of selling the old copper, he sailed in ballast to Halifax, and had his vessel resheathed, returned to Boston and took in his cargo.

Didn't that help the laborers of Boston with a vengeance? In order to help the copper mines in the West the laborers had to be thrown out of employment in the East.

The interests of the country are so varied that the tariff scheme cannot be made to work. Where one is helped another is hamstrung. There is but one proper way, and that is an open field, without favors to any, and with equal chances for all.

In a lumber district they want lumber protected, but want free manufactures. In a manufacturing district they want manufactures protected, but want free lumber. The tariff can never be made a success. It is a delusion and snare from start to finish. While it promotes one class of interests, it cripples another.

When will people learn that man, in order to reach the highest plane attainable, must be absolutely free? His energies must not be circumscribed—his limbs must not be crippled—his mind must be untrammeled.

I hav already made this article too long, and yet I hav only entered the outer gate of the subject.

Although I hav addressed this article to Mr. Hays, I would not hav my friends, Day, Brown, and Horton, think that I hav overlooked them. I think, if they scan my article closely, they will see that I hav tried to answer every objection raised by them fairly.

Can We Dispense With the Deity?—Concluded.

REPLY TO S. F. BENSON.

Brother Benson has given us the cause of the long list of atrocities that he enumerates in that "human weakness which · · · · has baptized the world in anguish and despair—viz.: to mistake human ignorance for divine wisdom." And he might hav added that human prosperity, the source of all idolatry, which has manifested itself in every age and still continues to do so, to deify and worship human wickedness, and to make self-love the supreme lord.

If all the world (except our own good selvs) are not "staggering under awful loads of original sin and ineradicable cussedness," it must be conceded that human nature has shown at times a fearful capacity for acquired sin and diabolical perversity; and it will be our surest safeguard against similar crime and folly to remember that we are heirs to a common heritage, and that all the awful as well as glorious possibilities of humanity are ours. We shall be less likely in such case to confound ourselvs with the deity and mistake our own folly and ignorance for divine wisdom, thus exalting "primitiv ignorance into infinit arrogance," the inevitable result of such presumption.

But when we consider the persistency with which the same evil propensities manifest themselvs in generation after generation, thus showing the tendency of the children to follow in the footsteps of the parents and eat the same bitter fruits of experience, the outlook for the race would be well-nigh hopeless could we not feel assured that in spite of our boundless folly and ignorance there is unerring wisdom—in spite of our heartless selfishness and cruelty there is a love that never faileth—in spite of our oft-demonstrated frailty there is an Omnipotence that maketh for righteousness—somewhere, if not in us at least within our reach, for help and guidance. And when we hav found unerring wisdom, unfailing love, and almighty power to carry out their dictates, we shall hav found Him who is the truth, the life, and the way, by whatever name we may call him.

Will Brother Benson tell me what he and other professed Atheists mean by progress when applied to the human race? Can there be progress without a definit goal toward which to direct our course? For the very word signifies going forward or toward something. But without an objectiv point to decide the direction in which we are traveling, we cannot be said to be going either forward or backward; we are merely drifting aimlessly. And what is the goal that must direct and inspire our progress? Can it be anything short of absolute perfection? Now, absolute perfection certainly cannot be predicated of the human race, else we should hav no need to progress towards it; we should hav already attained the goal. And if something outside of or beyond us and not yet realized, how came we by the idea? How did we come to conceive of, much less divine and strive after, something that has as yet no tangible existence, unless it be realized in the divine source of all these aspirations?

He who worships the truth worships God, for God is truth. He who worships love worships God, who is love. And he who in any way serves the cause of justice and righteousness serves God the sun of righteousness and the one only good.

The real atheist is he who knows no god but greed; no duty but self-interest; no love but self-love; no principle but policy. Cruel as the grave, remorseless as death, his heart harder than the nether millstone, he is the real blasphemer and infidel, no matter what may be the profession of his lips, or in how many church books his name may be enrolled as a member in good standing. And such atheism as this is one peril that I see to the cause of humanity in the persistent denial of the existence of the deity or the possibility of eternal life.

I wish I were as certain of the unalloyed happiness of those "to whom there is no God nor any eternal life" as is Brother Benson; but I hav seen and heard enough to the contrary among my unbelieving friends and acquaintances to giv me many a heartache. Brother Benson thinks I hav no right to say that "without God and eternal life this world is all a dreary muddle." I hav but quoted the language that a friend of mine who is without a belief in God or eternal life used to me in referring to this life. I had her experience in mind when I made the statement. But since he demands better authority, let Brother Putnam testify. Listen to his dismal recapitulation, in a recent essay, of some of the incidents of life in this "lovely paradise" until, though heroically endeavoring to "confront reality and make the best of it," hoping "by courage to win something of happiness from our dark surroundings," even his stout heart fails him and the bitter, despairing cry escapes his lips: "Oh, the horror and the agony of human life! We cannot, must not know it all. It would make one insane."

Read his lines on the death of a promising young man who perished by accident, that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER last summer,—the lines beginning, "Thou art gone in sudden horror." Throughout the whole poem he declares he sees no God, no comfort, no future life, only the untimely blighting of fond hopes, the sudden rending of tender ties and loving hearts. Contrast with his dismal verse, heavy with funeral gloom, this calm assurance of another poet:

> There is no death! what seems so is transition;
> This life of mortal breath
> Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
> Whose portal we call death.

Which view is best calculated to shed the sunshine of hope and happiness across the vale of tears?

Colonel Ingersoll says that sometimes he is inclined to think that a lie is the healthiest thing that is born into this world. And indeed it would seem so at times. But what happiness or satisfaction can a sincere lover of truth and justice find in living in a world in which this can be said, especially if he believes that this is the only world and the only life he will ever know? Would it not be a priceless blessing to such a one to feel assured that however evil and falsehood may triumph for a season, truth, like the soul, is immortal, and will prevail in the end, because "the eternal years of God are hers."

Earth is a lovely paradise when relieved of its incubus, not of faith and fear, but of crime and cruelty, disease and disaster, selfishness and sorrow, want and wickedness. But when has it ever been free from this incubus? Not since the Golden Age, of which we know only by dim tradition. And that blissful time will never return until the sun of righteousness shall arise upon our mental and moral darkness "with healing in his wings." And there are encouraging signs in the east that the dawn of the long looked-for day is at hand.

No, I hav never yet discovered that man will hav his ideals, his angels of purity and paradise of gladness, without reference to God or eternal life, nor has Brother Benson. If these ideals bud and bloom within the heart itself, it is because their seeds hav been first implanted there from their nativ realm of heaven. Let but these ideas of God and immortality ever perish from among mankind, and every bud and bloom of hope or true humanity will wither or perish with them. But this, thank heaven! will never be, for they are indeed a part of humanity itself, destined to be forever among the children of men who will never be permitted wholly to lose sight of the end for which they were created.

While I consider a far-off hope as better than none, I am no stranger to the philosophy that seeks to realize heaven here and now, but am a firm believer in its possibility. We are to a very large extent capable of creating our own heaven or our own hell, as the kingdom of either is primarily within us. As Milton says:

> The mind is its own place, and of itself
> Can make a hell of heaven—a heaven of hell.

We hav shown ourselvs hitherto fairly expert in making a hell of this fair earth; it is high time, in my opinion, that we bend our energies toward trying what we can accomplish in the other direction. It is a work worthy of angels (who were once all men and women on this or some other planet) and of us who may hope some day to become angels. And one of the speediest and surest methods by which to abolish the hell of poverty, misery, strife, and crime which makes of this life, for the most part, a mere wild beast struggle for survival—a fratricidal strife for the means of subsistence, and to institute a paradise of human brotherhood based on equal justice, equal rights, and equal opportunities for all, is to inaugurate and establish the single tax on land values, thereby doing away with special privilege and cutting the throat of all monopoly. And if Brother Benson will lend a hand to bring about this most to be desired consummation I, for one, will cheerfully agree that he has in him the makings of a very respectable angel, and will gladly accord him a front seat not only in the heaven he will hav been instrumental in establishing here below, but also in the radiant hereafter which is its legitimate outcome and glorious fulfilment. So now, Brother Benson, there's your chance to prove your faith by your works and show which of us most truly "loves his fellow-man." A. AUGUSTA CHAPMAN.

Consistent Answers Wanted.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The reformer who discusses but one subject, fluently though it be, is generally regarded by the multitude as a man of but one idea—a crank—and hence wields comparativly little influence, while the all-round reformer, who is thoroughly familiar with all important questions of the day, by cleverly handling them magnetizes and enthuses the multitude, thereby gaining influence and prestige.

Several leading western and southern dailies, though very conservativ on theology, hav published radical Freethought articles of mine, which, but for their previous publication of my tariff and other articles which attracted much attention and comment, would doubtless hav been rejected.

As the influence of Freethinkers grows with their ability to handle all-important questions, it is well, therefore, that THE TRUTH SEEKER, like our courts of justice, is broad and liberal enough to fairly and equally hear both sides of all important questions, thereby educating its readers thereon.

Hence I desire to ask the four Protectionists writing in your issue of August 25th a few questions.

Born and reared a Republican, whose brother is named after John C. Fremont, the first Republican presidential candidate, and whose father, even previous to 1861, was an outspoken Abolitionist, perilous though it was in the slave state of Maryland, naturally I mechanically followed my party in indorsing protection.

While defending protection my eyes were first opened to some of its inconsistencies, hence reason, not party prejudice, has since guided me. As both parties contained protectionists and free traders, to eliminate party prejudice we should examin the question from a purely social and economic standpoint. We should thoroughly settle one point of the controversy before passing to the next, and unless every decision we reach on these various points thoroughly harmonizes with every other decision, some of our conclusions must be erroneous. I hereby challenge any protectionist to harmoniously answer the following nineteen questions, and until he can do so let him not be so presumptuous as to attempt to teach others that about which he is himself ignorant.

1. Can tariff cheapen an article, yet simultaneously raise its producer's wages?

2. Would shrewd protectionists (like Carnegie) desire a tariff, if it cheapened what they sell—goods—and made dearer what they buy—labor?

3. Can we protect laborers by making dear through tariffs what they buy—goods—and admitting free through unrestricted immigration what they sell—labor?

4. If a tariff on products cheapens them, ought it to be put on (and cheapen) wheat and other farm products, which form the bulk of our exports? Why cheapen for foreigners that with which we principally pay them?

5. But if the McKinley tariff increased prices, did it not thereby necessitate a larger volume of money to handle the same products and correspondingly increase the financial stringency?

6. If a tariff on articles cheapens them ought it not be put lightest on the finished products, and heaviest on the raw material to cheapen it and thus widen our manufacturers' margin of profit? Why did the McKinley tariff invert this order?

7. If the tariff is no tax, why refund to exporting manufacturers 99 per cent of the duty on their imported raw material? Why do so if the foreigner pays it?

8. Unless protectiv tariff enhances domestic prices, why giv sugar producers a bounty in lieu of the removed sugar tariff?

9. Why more laboriously make tin plate itself instead of its cheaper exchangeable equivalent? If toil is more desirable than its fruits—labor products—why not destroy all labor-saving tools and machinery?

10. Aside from gifts or plunder, can anything but production, or trading lesser labor products for greater ones, enrich either an individual, a community, or a nation?

11. As trade is mutually beneficial, why (by tariffs) debar men from mutually increasing wealth and happiness by trade?

12. As foreigners expect pay involving American labor cost, can imports displace American labor? If they will accept pay involving no labor cost to us, why not trade them as much of this inexpensiv delusiv nothingness as we can for their substantial goods?

13. If protectiv tariff is good, would not prohibitiv tariff be better still?

14. If international trade is impoverishing, is not interstate trade equally hurtful?

15. Can foreign trade be injurious, yet shipping subsidies desirable?

16. Why with gunboats blockade our enemies' ports to injure them, and with tariffs blockade our own to benefit ourselvs?

17. Can trusts be injurious, yet the tariff fostering them beneficent?

18. Why are free trade England's average wages higher than those of protected Germany, Italy, Russia, and all other protected European nations? Where age of country, form of government, density of population, standing armies, and all else save tariff are similar, does not free trade giv the most factories, trade, wages, and general prosperity and protection the least?

19 Why do avowed Protectionist editors evade re-stating and answering such important questions in their own columns, and Protectionist orators fail to attempt their elucidation? D. WEBSTER GROH.

Annual Congress—Call of the Freethought Federation of America.

To the Liberals of America and Members of the Freethought Federation:

The Annual Congress of the Freethought Federation of America will be held in Chicago, Oct. 26th, 27th, and 28th, in conjunction with the Annual Congress of the American Secular Union. The importance of this Congress is great. The encroachments of the church are becoming more bold and dangerous. The attempts to amend the constitution so as to place our government on a Christian basis, and to pass a national Sabbath law, are indications of the attitude of the church. It has been and is today the enemy of freedom; and we must be constantly prepared to meet its conspiracies. We can not do this as an unorganized mass. We must join forces, otherwise we shall be defeated. We need a common impulse. There must be association. Let the gathering at Chicago be the greatest yet held in America. Think of past achievements as an inspiration to something better in the future. Freethought is growing. The necessity for political action is more apparent than ever. The means of action are improving. Freethought cannot go backward; it must step forward. Now is the opportunity for union and strength. This Congress is for work. Let there be an enthusiastic rally.

Who Pays?

There has been some lively discussion in THE TRUTH SEEKER as to whether tariff duties are paid by the consumer in this country or by foreigners. There is no better authority here than the Boston Advertiser, which calls itself the official paper of the state. It is one of the leading teachers of protectionism. In the editorial of Monday, September 3d, is the following statement: "Foreign wools are quoted lower all along the line, owing to the removal of the import duty." The levy of a duty on sugar is described as "a measure which increases the federal taxation by $2.50 of new taxation for every American family." This agrees with the fact that the price of sugar fell after it was put on the free list by McKinley four years ago. These are examples of the rule, and we shall probably find it hold good of the recent reductions on woolen goods.

"Woman has no one to blame but herself if she has fallen and become the slave of man. She holds the balance of power on the sex question. She held, by her own decision, the fate of the race. She yielded to temptation, hence groveled in the dust, dragging humanity down with her"—Woodville Eureka. The devil she did! We would advise the writer of the above and a lot more of the same kind of rot in the article from which this was taken, to read "Woman, Church, and State," by that grand old lady, Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage, and learn something.—Sunday Gazetteer.

It is an actual fact that a child in a school in Massachusetts, on being reproved by her teacher for lying habitually, answered carelessly, "Oh, whenever I tell a lie, I say, 'Forgiv me, God.'" Her religion has put her conscience to sleep.

News and Notes

The series of Freethought lectures under the auspices of the Chicago Secular Union was begun Sunday evening, Sept. 2d, with a lecture by myself on "Freethought and Morality." It was a hot night—about the hottest of the season—and the meeting not being generally advertised, a large audience was not present, but enough to make a beginning for the season, and for the preparatory work of the Liberal Congress to be held in October. Judge Waite presided. Dr. Greer, Attorney Beatty, Mr. and Mrs. Leon Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. Vincent, Mrs. Freeman, Mrs. Crawford, Mrs. Reichwald, Peacock, and other reformers and Freethinkers were present who are laboring in different fields for the Liberal cause. There will be more difficulty in straightout Freethought work this fall than at any other time, on account of so much politics. There is a tremendous agitation in regard to labor questions, and meetings are being held in every part of the city. There will be a great local contest. Many Liberals are engaged in these economical and political movements, and this diverts their attention from the importance of Freethought advance. While really at heart as much interested as ever in our cause, they are influenced by the magnitude of these other questions. But great as these questions are, the greatest is still Freethought. Before there can be industrial emancipation, there must be mental emancipation, and mental equipment. The labor problem must be settled by science. It cannot be settled by religion or sentiment, and there is no science without Freethought. There is no economical progress without progress in liberty.

Notwithstanding the vast excitements of the political field, I am sure that we shall hav a good Congress, and that good work will be done. There are favorable responses from all over the country. Some who were not present last year will be present this year, they write. We shall not hav the advantage of the World's Fair; but there will be more chance for work. The contributions are flowing in, which show that the pulse of Freethought is activ. We shall make the best use possible of the means at our command. These annual gatherings are necessary. We gain enthusiasm; the organization for work becomes stronger, and our united efforts are more successful. The churches and political parties are maintained by such gatherings. We must employ the same method for the consolidation of our forces.

It is curious to note at times what a prejudice we hav to work against. Treasurer Reichwald wanted to hav some typewriting done for the Federation and sent to Remington's agency. A number of ladies appeared who desired to do the work, but when they found that they must "typewrite" Freethought ideas—a call for a Freethought Congress, etc.,—their religious conscience was quite troubled, and although they really needed the money, they refused to do the work. It was sacrilegious. Some were members of Moody's church; but for the "Lord's sake" they couldn't earn a little money in an honest way. Eternal hell might be their portion if they did it. Some of the ladies wanted to convert Mr. Reichwald on the spot, and even offered to pray for him. It was a chance for missionary work, if not for typewriting. But when Reichwald informed one that his father, in a church building which he erected, had lost $40,000 through the dishonesty of its Christian members and trustees, she felt that there was not material for "blind faith" or "saintship," and her prayer was not offered. I guess about twenty typewriters were interviewed before a sufficiently sensible and liberal-minded young lady could be found to typewrite the call for a Freethought Congress. One would scarcely think that bigotry like this could exist in a city like Chicago. I should suppose that anyone who had lived in Chicago for any length of time would learn that business is business, and that to typewrite a call for a Freethought Congress would not condemn one to eternal perdition. This shows what an immense amount of superstition there is in the world; that the old theology is a most potent foe; and that the work of overthrowing it is not by any means near the finish.

The name Freethinker is still a dreadful name. Even the Chicago dailies stand aghast at it. In one of our advertising notices were the words, "Freethinkers, attention;" and although the advertisment was paid for as written, still these words were struck out. What THE TRUTH SEEKER says is true; that we must make the world know what a Freethinker is. The name is still a nightmare to millions. One value of a national Congress, as THE TRUTH SEEKER suggests, is to make Freethought more widely known; to define it and bring people's attention to its real purpose. Through means of a Congress we get a recognition that could not be otherwise obtained. We intend to procure documents for the public press which shall clearly state what Freethought is and make special efforts to hav the proceedings of the Congress published in the secular journals. Outside of the Freethought journals there is a mass of ignorance to contend against which is almost inconceivable to Freethinkers themselvs; and this among so-called intelligent people. Freethought is not known as it ought to be known. Its principles are not brought home to the people as they should be. If Freethought were only understood by the masses how much more effectiv it would be! A congress, besides engendering a noble enthusiasm among ourselvs, is also a channel by which Freethought can be introduced into the minds of many who, without this means, might never hear that there was such a thing as organized and constructiv Freethought. Amidst the reforms of the present age let us keep Freethought at the front, for there is where it belongs; and if we do not make Freethinkers of the men and women of the coming age we shall not hav the material whereby permanently to settle the great questions that, like thunder clouds, now loom and glow along the horizon of humanity's path. Let us then hav a grand rally at the Congress. Let us keep our colors flying. Amidst the tumult of contending parties Freethought is the straight line of science, justice, and perfect freedom.

The Observer Afloat.

A new use for me was discovered recently by a member of the Knickerbocker Yacht Club. Being in attendance at the August regatta of that maritime organization, my merits as ballast attracted the attention of Captain Fairchild of the yacht Atchie, and he shipped me on his weather rail. Although I retreated to the cockpit when the first wave washed the deck (for I had my shore clothes on), we won the race gloriously, and I hav an engagement as mascot whenever the Atchie sails again.

Encouraged by this success as a mariner, I hav since ventured on deeper water than Long Island Sound affords, and during the week which ended Wednesday, September 5th, I was a passenger on board the fishing smack Gertrude Summers, of Noank, Conn.; Silas Latham, captain. This is a sixty-two ton schooner, about a hundred feet in length by twenty feet or thereaways in diameter. The Summers has seen a good many Winters, but is nevertheless a tight and able craft. Captain Latham is a Connecticut Yankee, and has been such for more than fifty years. The crew, who address the foregoing as Cap and refer to him as the Old Man, are ten in number and an altogether able-bodied group of citizens. The Summers is a co-operativ institution, and as under the command of Captain Latham she is remarkably successful, the best men in the calling are glad to be shipmates on board of her. I heard that if a man wants a berth under Skipper Latham he must wait with patience until somebody dies. The boat carries a steward who served on a man-of-war during the Rebellion, a Portuguese sailor who by right of color should be second cousin to the steward, four Norwegian fishermen, mostly named Peter, and four Americans. Captain Latham keeps one eye on the horizon and the other aloft, and works his ship by the sense of feeling. He is a quiet man, who jokes with his crew and issues his orders in the same tone of voice and without change of countenance. One morning, when the weather was thick, he called his Portuguese sailor aft, and directed him to get out the baskets and shovels and stow the fog below; but he never cracked a smile. Disciplin on the Summers is as good as in a newspaper office, and some of its forms are carried further. On deck I overheard this conversation:

CAPTAIN LATHAM: Let her luff a little, Peter.

PETER (at the wheel): Let her luff a little, sir.

At dinner the following occurred:

CAPTAIN LATHAM: Peter, let the potatoes come this way.

PETER (executing the command): Let the potatoes come this way, sir.

Orders, it appears, are repeated, like important telegrams, so that there may be no misunderstanding. On shore, passing the potatoes might be regarded as sufficient evidence that the order was comprehended, but sailormen take no chances.

The Summers, with all hands on deck and the skipper at the wheel, was tugged out of the dock near the foot of Fulton street, Thursday evening, August the 30th, and tied up in Gowanus creek for ice. The Prophet who resides in that locality did not make his appearance. We took in ice until there were twenty tons of it aboard. A Staten Island waterman also pumped his cargo into our scuttle-butt, and our colored cook shipped watermelons for a long voyage. The following morning the tug helped us out of the creek, when Gertrude spread her white wings, took a bone in her teeth, as the sailors say, and with a fresh westerly breeze we slipped out through the narrows, rounded Sandy Hook, and before noon were fairly on the high seas. The Jersey coast, along which we passed, has a good many attractions for landsmen in the way of summer resorts—Long Branch, Seabright, Atlantic City, Anglesea, Cape May, and so forth—but sailors hav no love for it. Its roaring surf can be heard for miles out to sea, and its sands are strewn with wrecks and dead men's bones. I could count the wrecks, but Davy Jones had taken care of the relics. We went near enough to Sandy Hook to inspect the government testing grounds for guns and armor, where the blowholes in Carnegie's steel plate gained their notoriety, and where the dynamite gun pokes its muzzle high in the air. These playthings did not arouse my enthusiasm.

The Summers ordinarily cruises after bluefish, but as bluefish are almost a drug in the market, Captain Latham stowed his horse-mackerel seine and got out his porgy net. It takes one fish to catch another, and to bring porgies to the surface it is necessary to bait them with menhaden, or moss-bunkers, an oily and shad-like citizen of the deep, much esteemed by his contemporaries as an article of diet. The "bunker" is so lacking in intelligence and foresight that he always reveals himself by agitating the surface of the water, and fishermen can detect his presence at a distance of half a mile or more. Off Anglesea we saw several schools of these bunkers, and the captain and most of his men went off with their nets to catch a mess for bait. The vessel was left in charge of the cook and a sailor called Gus, and it was while the crew were thus absent that I observed the first and only indications visible during the voyage that our colored man and brother possessed a temper. The flue of Mr. Cook's stove is surmounted by a piece of stovepipe with an elbow at the top, which must be judiciously twisted about, or "trimmed," in order to create a draft. While the boats were out after the bunkers the sailorman Gus kept the schooner going back and forth over a triangular course waiting for the men to "make a set" with the seine. Every time he shifted his helm the wind went down the stovepipe and the cook came simultaneously on deck to fix his chimney-pot. After he had done this a half dozen times he grew impatient. Later on he became exasperated, and the language that emerged from the hatchway at about that period was as blue and dense as the smoke which evoked it I could not blame him a bit for swearing, for I do not see what else he could hav done under the circumstances.

The crew made a good haul of bunkers—about 4,000 pounds—which, being scooped out of the seine into a dory, filled the boat so well that the man who rowed it stood in live bait almost to his knees. From the dory the bunkers were shoveled to the deck of the schooner, where they lay patting the planks with their tails, and producing a sound like the crackling of thorns under a pot, until the men got them into the ice-house below.

Thus prepared for the temptation of porgies, the schooner sailed away for the fishing-grounds, the spot chosen, after interviews with many other fishermen, being Five Fathom Bank, off Cape May, I think, though I could not recognize the cape projecting into the water as represented in the geographies, nor yet could I see the blue border, pink outline, and yellow background, as the man who made the book has painted the edge of New Jersey.

Before going further in my account of what happened to the Gertrude Summers, I will pause for some general remarks about life aboard a fishing-smack. The hour for rising in the morning is any time after 4 o'clock. The captain is first up and produces animation in the others by raising a deep-sea note from his chest calling upon them to "turn out." Sailors do not retire or arise, or go to bed or get up. They "turn in" and "turn out," which terms are very appropriate, as entering or leaving a bunk is mostly a matter of turning. The motion can be closely imitated by rolling under a bed and out again. Neither do seamen remove their trousers when seeking repose, especially if the vessel be in motion. I once met an old salt in whom the habit of sleeping in his nether garments was so fixed that he got between the sheets of a bed on a Sound passenger steamer trousers and all, remarking as he did so that he never took off his breeches when under weigh. The sailor's bathroom is the deck of his ship, where divested of his clothing he submits to being doused with seawater from a drawbucket, some other sailor cheerfully handling the same. I expected to enjoy a dive into the briny off the rail of the Summers, but forbore on account of sharks, which are always plentiful on fishing grounds, and which revealed their presence to us in considerable numbers by gliding about the ship with their main fin out of water. Captain Latham occasionally catches one in his seine, which he regrets because of the damage done to his "twine," as the fabric of the net is termed. In such cases, Captain Latham grabs the big fish by his caudal fin and cuts his tail off with a large knife. This has the effect of capital punishment on the shark.

I here hav to warn myself that the quality of utter boundlessness, which the philosophers accord to space in general, does not belong to the space available in a newspaper's columns. Just as I am getting interested in what I hav to say, the brick drops, and I will let the knife wherewith Captain Latham has curtailed the shark fall also upon this veracious narrativ. I shall resume next week.

Freethought Progress.

At one of the principal colleges of Lima, Peru, the prize in Natural History was awarded to a student who gave an exposition of the "Theory of Descent."

The fund raised for a monument in honor of the late Ramon Chiés has reached the sum of 5,000 pesetas. ∴∴ The Freethinkers of Portugal hav started an activ campaign among the working classes. Lectures and meetings are held almost daily in all large cities.

Deak, the Hungarian statesman of more than a generation ago, adopted Cavour's motto of "A free church in a free state," and recent events in Hungary giv strong ground for hope that the aspiration will soon crystallize into fact. The passage of the civil marriage bill is a long step in the right direction.

Joseph Symes's Melbourne Liberator has been published ten years. ∴∴ At last New Zealand election ten ministers stood for parliamentary honors; none received them. ∴∴ According to the Victorian Year Book of 1888-89, no Bible instruction of any kind was given in the public schools of New Zealand.

The Freethinkers of Belgium are activ as ever. May 27th, the Federation of Charleroi, the president of which is M. Jules Des Essarts (a portrait and biography of whom is found in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought"), held a well-attended and enthusiastic congress. July 1st, the General Council of the National Federation held its semi-annual reunion at Brussels.

Civil funerals are on the increase in France, and the same is true in the United States. ∴∴ The latest Bulletin Mensuel bears witness to the extraordinary activity of the French Freethinkers. Lectures are the order of the day, as are excursions, festivals, etc. On a recent Good Friday anti-church demonstrations were held in several cities, and at Le Mans M. Hubbard had a discussion with a priest.

The late Liberal conference at Chicago indicated the rapid convergence of the radical Jews and the radical Unitarians. One-fifth of the ministerial signers of the call were Jews and nearly one-half were Unitarians. A newspaper remarks that "many Unitarian ministers are apparently more Jewish than Christian, and some Jewish ministers are more Unitarian than Jewish." ∴∴ Rabbi Mendes charges the Jews with unfaithfulness to the old creeds; he says that they disregard the Sabbath and are weak, religiously, in other directions. Upon this the New York Sun remarks that "the Jews are simply following the drift toward the rejection of formal religious restraints which interfere with the pursuit of enjoyment. They are simply feeling the influence of the fashionable infidelity of the time."

In Holland the cheap Dutch translation of Büchner's "Force and Matter," issued this year in celebration of the German Atheist's seventieth birthday, is selling well, over three thousand copies having been disposed of in two months. Mr. Ten Bokkel has issued a popular pamphlet on "How Did Religion Arise?" and Mr. van Ende is bringing out a pamphlet entitled "Twenty-five Proofs of the Truth of Christianity," the proofs consisting of illustrated instruments of torture. The pamphlet will hav a satirical introduction by Torquemada, Hoochstraat, and Spenger, commending the rack, wheel, thumbscrew, and Spanish boot as the best and most efficacious proofs of Christianity. Mr. van Ende is engaged in gathering materials for the history of Freethought in Holland, a most important undertaking.—London Freethinker. ∴∴ In his brochure, "Anthropopithecus Erectus," the Dutch scientist, Eugen Dubois, M.D., announces the discovery on the island of Java of what he considers the long desired "missing link," a human species bridging the space between present man and the pleistoian. The skeleton found is well preserved.

To counteract the frantic efforts of the Christian missionaries in spreading the pernicious teachings of Christianity in Japan the Buddhists hav imported and translated into Japanese Paine's "Age of Reason," and a Japanese daily advertises it under the heading, "A Crushing Answer to the Promoters of the Christian Faith." ∴∴ Rev J. C. Newton, a Methodist missionary returned from Japan, said, in an address before the Woman's Missionary Association at Fort Worth, Tex., that the Japanese are becoming suspicious of foreign influence and are not so friendly toward the missionaries as they were. The "higher criticism" also has reached Japan and is having its effect on reflectiv minds. Mr. Newton charges this to the Congregationalists. "Congregationalism is shifting toward Rationalism." Congregational missionaries "hav gone to startling extremes in the renunciation of cardinal principles of Christian belief. They even go so far as to discredit the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ and deny the atonement of his blood." The Buddhists also are quite activ, for the first time in many years, against the Christian propagandism. Missionaries hav "never had to confront greater obstacles" in Japan than those which they are now facing.

A monument is to be erected at Viareggio in honor of Percy Bysshe Shelley. ∴∴ Rev. Compton Reade, rector of Kenchester, contributes to the Religious Review of Reviews a paper on the "Agnostic Wave," which he says is sweeping over the English-speaking world. "The upper stratum of society is drifting astern from the ark of Christ's church." "The enemy is coming in like a flood." ∴∴ A life of Charles Bradlaugh, by his daughter, Mrs. Bradlaugh-Bonner, with an introduction by J. M. Robertson, will be published in October by Fisher Urwin. ∴∴ The New Science Review has appeared in London. The first number has an article by Moncure D. Conway on "Thomas Paine and the Republic of the World," and one by Julian Hawthorne on "Scientific Creation." ∴∴ The July issue of the International Journal of Ethics has for leading article A. J. Balfour's paper on "Naturalism and Ethics." Mr. Balfour admits that the evolutionist's account of the growth of the ethical faculty is rational. ∴∴ In Wales the farmers stoutly resist the payment of tithes to the established church. This helped lead to the introduction in Parliament of the bill for the disestablishment of the Welsh state church. The New York Independent cannot understand why the American Episcopal papers so persistently oppose disestablishment in Wales while claiming to approve separation of church and state in America. It says: "The right of tithing or of receiving interest of compounded tithes is one that should be taken away without redress."

A writer in the Evangelische Botschafter, of Stuttgart, is of the opinion that the state church of Germany has drifted away from the orthodox faith, and he makes the prophecy that the time is close at hand when those who really believe in Christ will be forced to form free congregations. He says that there is an ever-increasing rationalism in the state church, and this among the ministers themselvs. "In orthodox Wurtemburg, the pastors are still forced to preach the Christ of the Bible; but if they did not fear the loss of their livings, many would champion Rationalism. ∴∴ It seems as if the church is forced to allow its fundamental doctrins to be destroyed by the very men who were appointed to guard it!" Our American advocates of state-churchism should take warning. ∴∴ The Freethought Federation of Germany held its twelfth congress in the "holy" city of Köln. Professor Büchner presided. The congress was well attended and societies in Berlin, Karlsruhe, Hamburg, Wiesbaden, Kiel, Chemnitz, Mannheim, and Mühlhausen were represented, as well as the Freethought Federations of Rheinland and Westfalm. Speeches were delivered by Mr. W. Gerling, Dr. A. Rüdt, "The Death Penalty a Barbarism;" Dr. B. Wille, "The Ennobling of Mankind;" Professor Büchner, "Pre-Christian Christianity;" and others. The following resolution presented by Dr. Bruno Wille was adopted with but one dissenting vote: "Certain Socialistic societies having for the last ten years counteracted this organization on account of its supposed opposition and non-appreciation of the social questions, it is resolved by the Freethought Congress assembled at Köln a. R. that such opposition is entirely at variance with the truth. Freethought does not exclude any endeavors tending to the solution of the social question, but it invites such, only leaving the means to the choice of each individual Freethinker." ∴∴ The Freethought Society of Berlin, whose president is Dr. Bruno Wille, is yet fighting the government, which has prohibited "irreligious instruction," in direct violation of the constitution. ∴∴ The German Peace Society has now more than two thousand members. ∴∴ The gold medal of the Linnæan Society has this year been awarded to Prof. Ernst Haeckel, of Jena, for his valuable contributions to zoological science. ∴∴ Emperor William has written a letter to the University of Halle, on the occasion of its bi-centenary celebration. He lauds "Halle's initiativ in establishing the principle of free inquiry in theology, philosophy, and the like, which he describes as now the inalienable and common property of all the German universities and one of their most distinctiv characteristics. This utterance has been quoted in every liberal paper throughout the empire and greeted with the warmest congratulation, but the reactionary press has preserved a bitter silence," writes Harold Frederic to the New York Times.

The New York Times remarks that "the great heresy which the Presbyterians of Scotland and the United States hav invented, is that of accepting a body of well-ascertained facts." ∴∴ Religious papers are loudly protesting against the filling of chairs in Christian colleges with non-Christian professors. No doubt all such instructors should be Christian, but it is significant that so many of them are Agnostics. It shows how very difficult it is for an educated man to remain within the pale of the church, despite the rewards she offers to hypocrisy. ∴∴ In the last two years the Secularists of Oregon hav done much good work. A secular park has been established at New Era, and is being handsomely improved. "A joint stock company will be formed in the near future for the purpose of building a secular university and crematorium in the vicinity of the park," reports the Oregon City Courier. ∴∴ Dr. Buckley of the Christian Advocate, has little confidence in death-bed visions. He remarks: "All that a person who professes to hav passed through such experiences can tell is what he thinks that he recollects, and by the very assumption the judging faculties are held in abeyance. Of such visions we hav read hundreds, if not thousands. As literature, when well written, they are interesting; as communicating information of value, useless. The nature of the disease, the influence of drugs, and many other things affect the result." This is hard on the pious inventors and retailers of stories of Infidel death-bed horrors and conversions. ∴∴ Rev. Dr. Scudder, of Jersey City, has discovered that bicycles are not soul-destroyers, even when used on Sunday. He says that after a spin on his, he "begins to feel like an angel." Still, he rebukes young men who ride their wheels on Sunday for mere pleasure, instead of coming on them to his church. He is providing stabling facilities at his tabernacle for the use of wheelmen. ∴∴ What was formerly known as the Unitarian Church of Kalamazoo is now called the People's church. The pastor, Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett, and her parishioners, who "discard all creeds as fellowship tests," deeming the Unitarian label altogether too sectarian, formally resolved to abjure it for good and all. ∴∴ While the Presbyterian General Assembly voted to assume direct control of the Presbyterian theological seminaries, Union Theological Seminary will, according to the prophecy of the New York Sun, continue to teach heresy in the name of the "Higher Criticism." The Sun says: "That institution will go on in its criticism of the Bible as a book of errors and false pretenses. Neither will the vote of the General Assembly lessen the determination of some of the richest of the New York Presbyterians to giv it the greater substantial support because of that very teaching. Opposition only serves to strengthen them in their Infidelity. ∴∴ Nominally the Presbyterian church continues unbroken. Really it is split into two widely separate and diametrically opposed parties, the camp of faith and the camp of Infidelity." ∴∴ Fast day observance in Connecticut is coming to be a farce. This year the "union service" was omitted in Fair Haven because the ministers thought the interest aroused in the services was not sufficient to warrant the necessary preparation. Rev. Mr. Mitchell says that the observance has "become a big humbug in Fair Haven," whereupon the Providence Journal observes: "The same condition exists in the average Connecticut community." ∴∴ It goes without saying that the "theory" of evolution is pretty well established when an assembly of orthodox ministers invites an advocate of that all-inclusiv principle of development to present his views regarding it to said assembly. This is what happened in San Francisco, and Prof. Joseph Le Conte was the evolutionist who addressed the clergymen. ∴∴ There is now manifested in the Unitarian organization a very strong tendency to so widen the Unitarian field that it will reach out much beyond Christianity.

Freethought Federation—Treasurer's Report.

We publish the contributions of friends for one week. If the response to our appeal continues as general for the coming weeks we shall hav enough for a good Congress, and shall be able to do effectiv work. We want to send out a large number of documents. It is necessary to stir Liberals up. Send us the funds so that we can do this. Send something, no matter how small the sum. It will help. It is of the utmost importance to keep our organization at the front.

They hav had what the Houston, Tex., Herald calls a "church racket" in that city. It seems that the rector of Christ's Episcopal Church, with the consent and in the presence of the bishop, allowed a negro minister to officiate in that church. This concession has greatly disturbed and exasperated the church members, who are white. Of course it is permitted to a negro to minister to those of his own race, and public sentiment now allows a white man to preach to colored people; but that a negro minister should officiate for a white congregation, even with the consent of the rector and the bishop, is something not to be endured by those to whom God has shown his mercy by dressing them up in a white skin. As our Episcopalian brethren believe in the doctrin of the apostolic succession, and this negro ministers was regularly ordained, it would seem that the action of the angry white brethren involved a disrespect for the holy ghost. We read in the book of Acts that the pentecostal spirit was poured out upon people of all nations, who represented, not only many different tongues, but many different hues. Our Southern brethren would probably claim that the apostles were all white. We should really like to know what sort of an epistle the apostle Paul would write to the people of Houston if he were alive and heard of this transaction.—Christian Register.

Very few blame Adam for sinning when he was persuaded by such a beautiful creature in such becoming costume as represented in the Doré pictorial Bible. Will some innocent Methodist preacher please cast the first stone?

God has always opposed knowledge and the devil has always been its champion. A few years ago it was proof of intimacy and league with the devil, punishable by death, to invent a new machine.

CLEAR CREEK, TEX., Aug. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to hav to write and tell you that one of the most interested readers of your paper died on the 21st day of July.

He was my husband and his name was Tom Cooke. He was always glad to get THE TRUTH SEEKER, and always said, "Do not hav a preacher to come and worry me when I am ill, or to preach over my grave." So he had his wish, and I think if there is such a place as heaven, he will be as likely to go there as any one, for a better man never lived. He was a kind husband and an affectionate father, and was kind to every one. He died of congestion of the brain, and was ill only two weeks. My father says he will continue to take your paper. I read it whenever I hav time.

The Revivalist's Styles and Methods.

LAWRENCEBURG, TENN., Aug. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the following books: "Orthodoxy vs. Evolution," "Thumbscrew and Rack," and "Self-Contradictions of the Bible."

During our last series of revivals the parson was an ex-cowboy from Texas. He preached in the usual manner, and about the third night he told the young people that they must either stop keeping company or stay at home. The next command was for the good sisters to organize into a salvation army, and pray in all homes and places of business. He also tried to get all the business men to close their houses from 10 to 12 A.M., but you can be sure that our ranch did not close, even when he preached in the square. There is one parson here who did not take any stock in his meetings, and he is a very liberal man, and I hav a great respect for him, but the Texas preacher gave him hades, at least he preached him there.

Yours very truly, M. RICHARDSON.

Hopeless Search for the "Infidel" Hero of a Tract.

CROSBY, TEX., Aug. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a little tract, published at Harrisburg, Pa. The tract explains itself in its own way, but has not been so satisfactory with me. To explain more fully: On June 26th I received the tract by mail as first-class matter, without any comments or signature of the sender. I suspected that there was a "bug under the chip." I wrote to the publisher of the tract, inclosing stamp, for the address of the subject mentioned in said tract, as I believed that, if true, John Harvey was a near relativ of mine whose address I had lost. The publishers wrote to me on a postal card that the American Tract Society was the author of the tract. I also addressed them, with stamp, but hav not received any answer from them. The case, I think, is a falsehood of the first order, or the American Tract Society has a lack of honor and truthfulness. It is an easy thing to convert skeptics and Infidels on paper, and teach such falsehoods to children in their holy Sunday-schools. I hav not the least doubt but that these tracts are sent out by the thousands by their publishers to poison the minds of innocent children who hav not the discretion to weigh the matter in a reasonable way.

I am confident that some sky-pilot, who is too cowardly to face me in an argument on the merits of Christianity or the principles of Infidelity, sent me the tracts. As to the tracts, they are ashamed to sign their names to their silent arguments. I send some of my TRUTH SEEKERS to the sky-pilots in this country and always write my name on the wrapper so that Mr. Preacher can easily tell from whence they came. I ask of them to be as frank with me. J. C. HARVEY.

Swan Still Searching.

WOONSOCKET, R. I., July 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Being absent from home almost continually, I hav not seen a copy of the noble old TRUTH SEEKER for five months, nevertheless I am seeking for the truth, and should I giv you all of my experience for the past year in trying to condemn Spiritualism, it would require one whole issue of your paper, but I wish to giv one little incident that happened but two days ago, and ask some kind brother to divine the cause. Last Friday I took the steamer at St. John, N. B., for Portland, Me., where I arrived on Saturday at 6 A.M., after a siege of sea sickness. When called at Portland, I proceeded to dress myself, but found I was minus one shoe, and the united efforts of all the porters and cabin-boys failed to discover its whereabouts. Without stopping to laugh or comment on how I got along with one shoe, a "shoeing it," I will say that I arrived in Boston without losing my trousers, and wended my to a Mrs. Knight, of 484 Columbus street, who givs independent slate writings. I said nothing of my failure in the shoe business, who I was, or where I was from, but the first communication I received purported to come from my deceased son, and wound up with, "Pa, don't worry over your lost shoe." As I cleaned the slates myself, closed them together without pencil of any kind between them, and as they never left my hands or eyesight, and in a light room, I could see no possible chance for fraud of any kind.

This is not the first time I hav been "hit in the eye" and had my Materialistic Gatling gun spiked (to which I had become so much attached), but will add no more, only asking some Materialistic brother to send me some real fighting powder, so I can shoot back. Send me a never-failing recipe, for I've got it bad, and Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup will never cure me.

A. D. SWAN.

P.S.—Don't send anything that will shoot backwards or flash in the pan, for I hav tried such and failed. S.

He Misses It.

WOONSOCKET, R. I., Aug. 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I failed to receive THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 25th. Kindly send a copy, for I cannot get along at all if I miss even one issue. It is as good as victuals and drink to me; in fact, it is my Bible. There is not a word in it that I skip, and then I lend it to others. By the way, is there not a fund for the purpose of sending the paper to Liberals who are not able to subscribe for it? If so, I would suggest that it be sent to George M. Hare, of this place, a stanch old worker for the cause who is in very poor circumstances. THE TRUTH SEEKER in his hands loses nothing. Hope that it may be so arranged that he will hav it sent to him. If I was able I would see that his paper was paid for, but my finances are too limited at present.

Can a Freethinker consistently assume the obligations of the Odd Fellows or the Freemasons?

Hoping to hear from you through the columns of your paper, I remain,

Your friend and well-wisher,

WILLIAM SLATER MOURY.

[There is no fund provided for the purpose named, but often one of our well-to-do subscribers pays for the paper for some poor Liberal, especially if he is aged and finds rest and cheer in its perusal. We hav no doubt that Mr. Hare is a worthy candidate for such assistance.

Our subscribers who are Odd Fellows or Masons can better answer Mr. Moury's second question. We refer the query to them.—ED. T. S.]

Are Ministers Privileged?

CLAY CENTER, KAN., Aug. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In connection with the case of J. B. Wise, who was arrested for quoting Isa. xxxvi, 12, and lodged in jail for sending obscene literature through the mails, I wish to state that I attended the meetings of the so-called evangelist here in Clay Center, the town where Mr. Wise was arrested. The evangelist read before an audience of some four or five hundred people, two-thirds of whom were ladies, from John iii, 4. Then he referred to Gen. vi, 4, "There were giants in those days," etc. Now, if Mr. Wise committed a serious offense in sending a verse through the mails, how much more serious was Mr. Rosewarne's offense in reading before such an audience the passages above indicated! The reverend sky-pilot has a good deal more to say, for a wonder, about the church and its rottenness than he has to say about Infidels. He stated distinctly that the churches were rotten to the core.

Mr. Rosewarne delivered a lecture last Sunday on inspiration, or "The Bible: Whence Is It?" He is requested to repeat it next Sunday (to-morrow) in the Methodist church, and any unbeliever present may answer it on the spot. I hav written W. S. Bell to be here if possible to answer him. In his lecture last night he announced the coming lecture, and said he intended to produce such a chain of evidence that no one on earth, nor all the devils in hell, nor yet even the angels in heaven, could answer it. This egotism reminds me of the old Scotch lady whose fault-finding with her pious neighbors was about on a par with his. Her criticisms of her pious neighbors led one to exclaim: "Why, Janet, I really believe you think no one will be saved but you and the minister." "Oh, my dear," was the reply, "I while's hae my doots about the minister." From yours truly,

GEO. HARRISON.

Some Sensible Observations.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Aug. 29, 294.

MR. EDITOR: It will be no surprise to you or any of your readers, especially those who are acquainted with me, to hear me say that I am an "Infidel" of the most pronounced type. I avow openly my disbelief in divine inspiration, miracles, and prophecy; also in a personal God or a future for any one's individuality. I am a sincere accepter of the laws of nature and science, and believe we should study and explain all we know about them. And I am a sincere advocate of the Nine Demands of Liberalism and I oppose dating from any event that will not bear the investigation of modern criticism. There are several other things that I do and do not believe in, one of which is the expensiv funeral and burial system of to-day. Why do we decorate the dead? Why put the last remains in a metallic casket or rosewood coffin and waste thousands in stone monuments with iron fences around them? Why disinter what remains of the last body one has before he dies and at great expense carry it hundreds or thousands of miles by express, there to be buried again at great expense? I said the last body because the tissues, muscles, and bones are constantly decaying and being replaced by other matter, and since I began to think about it it seems so strange to me that we do so much to keep the last bit of substance separate from other matter, when it is impossible to keep it long and in many cases dangerous to the living. Why do we waste money on the dead, whom we cannot benefit, while the living need the money? Why not cremate every corpse by electricity generated by water power at an expense of not to exceed $5? The gases will not convey disease in that way. The truth is, we hav been taught so long that we cannot sufficiently honor and remember the dead, that my words above will seem to most people to be all wrong. It will seem to them that I hav no feelings, while it seems to me that I love and remember my dead friends as much as others do theirs. I like to look at their pictures and would be more glad to see them.

Mortuary—Joseph Shin.

PATMOS, O., Aug. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Joseph Shin, a long time patron of your paper, died on the 18th of August, 1894, aged about eighty years. Friend Shin came here with his Quaker parents when he was eight years old. Once he refused to take his hat off in Methodist meeting, for which he was fined. Still our departed friend was a man of peace. For the forty years I hav known him, I never knew him to hav a dispute, or be angry with anyone. He highly prized THE TRUTH SEEKER, and was much charmed with the pictures. For more than twenty years he was afflicted with consumption, but living in a large house, and being much in the open air, may hav prolonged his life. Cheerful under his affliction, genial and sociable with his friends, he has left a memory of a life that few hav excelled. J. B. SMITH.

THOUGHTS ON DEATH.

When a friend or relativ passes away we are apt to think on death and immortality. Can the latter be bestowed on man? Surely a happy future should be his, if it is possible, because of the knowledge and fear of death, because of the dread of annihilation and the hope for immortality, and because of the suffering endured here, and the yearning desire to join the loved ones who hav gone before. Yet better, far better, should there be no future life than that one human soul should go to the hell of the Bible. But one of the blessings of Liberalism is that we scout the idea of the Christians' hell. But there is small consolation in believing that our bodies are immortal and will liv in the fruits and flowers, and why not in meaner things? Or, in the positiv belief of our friends the Spiritualists, that the spirits of the departed are all around us and conscious of all our actions. If true, how sad they would be. But as a future is all in the imagination, and if accorded to us, why not trust that that future will be far more glorious and exquisitly happy than human immagination can conceive? Or, if we take others' description, take that of the Psalmist, "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor the imagination of man conceived of the glory of my father's mansion." Or Byron, skeptic that he was, when he writes:

Yet if there be, as fondest souls hav deemed,
A land of souls beyond that sable shore,
To shame the doctrin of the sadducee,
And sophists vain of dubious lore, etc.

J. B. SMITH.

A Sensational Scheme.

CINCINNATI, O., Aug. 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed was taken from the Times-Star, this city, of Aug. 22:

A plan is being talked of, which, if carried out, might well be called the climax of the mission of the new Columbian Liberty and Peace bell, about which so much interest was centered at the World's Fair. It is to take the bell to the Holy Land, and on Christmas eve of 1900, just before the opening of the twentieth century, to ring it on the spot where, on the first Christmas, was heard the angels' song whose words the bell bears impressed upon its surface. The plan contemplates that all telegraph companies shall close their business ten minutes before the appointed hour, and that Bethlehem shall be connected with every telegraph office and with every church that so arranges, and that thus there shall be repeated around the globe the sound of the bell whose first stroke ushered in the Parliament of Religions, and whose ringing in Judea may symbolize "the parliament of man and the federation of the world," as the projectors claim.

What does it mean? Is it that they, the so-called Christians, who hate a live Jew and worship a dead one, want to take our Liberty Bell from our country? Or is it a new one they want to send across the water to proclaim peace?

Will not their Christ hear it if rung in free America on Christmas eve of 1900 as well as if it were taken to Palestine?

The sentiment is very pretty, but does not the dear old Liberty Bell belong to the American people and not to a handful of idol worshipers, for surely that is what the Christian sects are?

Joseph Cook has said: "There are twenty thousand Buddhists in Boston." If it only be true, what an array of truth seekers there are for our side. It goes to show that people are learning more and more the true brotherhood of man; that they cannot worship the man Jesus and hate his brother; that one and all hav the right to make and form their own god (how I wish they would spell it with two o's) according to facts, not fancies. Sentiment is all right, but there is no religion higher than truth. Call it God if they like.

But what do they intend to do? Please let us know through your paper, and oblige, Yours respectfully.

CORA B. DAVIS.

[It is not the genuin "Liberty Bell," but an imitation one, made by casting together a large number of revolutionary relics and other not so "sacred" material. Would it not be as well to keep the bell here and send out its notes on American air in 1900? Of course not; that would not be nearly so sensational; it would not attract a hundredth part of the attention nor bring in a thousandth part of the money that the Holy Land scheme will, if consummated. There is nothing like advertising, and religious wares feel the stimulus just as readily as more useful goods. The bell-ringing is to be only the climax in a gigantic spectacular performance which is intended to belt the globe with a zone of flamboyant and invasiv Christianity. The theocratic branch of the church first broached the scheme.—ED. T. S.]

Wants a Searching Party Organized.

SALESVILLE, MONT., Aug. 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am a friend to Spiritualism. I recognize its services and aid in abating, in a measure, the nuisance of orthodoxy, and to a certain extent in mitigating the rigor of its tyranny and in slowly undermining its arrogance. Instead of throwing obstacles in its way which would be a hindrance to its progress toward a demonstration of its claims, I would rather at any time when in my power supply the conditions by which demonstrations that would place it upon a permanent basis of fact could be made. Therefore, it is discouraging in the extreme when we find ourselvs confronted with the fact that it persistently ignores a most important and practical line of proof, which is perfectly consistent, so far as I know, with every condition it demands, and one that any rational being would logically suppose it would adopt. Why is it that the things one would naturally suppose it would do, and can do, and which would render its claims acceptable to all, are the very things which it persistently does not do? By way of illustration we may say, for instance, the claim is made that there is one phase of mediumship possessed with a special gift of transmitting perfectly authentic written messages from the spirit realm to mortals on earth. It is not necessary to mention the other phases of mediumship, this alone is sufficient for my purpose. In this one phase alone, if true, we hav the potentiality of all the proof necessary. It is ample for the speedy and universal conviction of the world. There is no other phase of mediumistic power fraught with the possibilities of this, nor so far reaching or so general in its application. Materializations, table-tippings, raps, everything else, as a consequence of their restricted operations, sink into insignificance when compared with this one wonderful accomplishment, as a means of universal proof. By it the remotest confines of civilization can be reached; well authenticated messages from the spirit dead can go laden with unmistakable proof to the humblest homes as well as to the palaces of kings. Why not open up shop to spirits instead of to men? Let them visit the mediums and transmit messages, and thus spare mortals the expense of a journey that not one in a hundred is financially able to incur. The personage who would occupy this position would become the spokesman between the two worlds, the most important of all men, the channel of communication, in the most practical sense, between the living and the dead. A pepetual current of useful, practical, and convincing intelligence would constantly flow, and a rushing torrent of humanity would pour into the ranks of Spiritualism like a Niagara of waters. Why? Because the proof will hav become practical, and therefore general. Exponents of Spiritual philosophy cannot expect conviction of thinking people generally by the introduction of isolated instances of persons traveling perhaps hundreds of miles to test a high-power medium and report results when they hav every facility at hand to make proof which will be general in its application. And that, too, a species of proof in direct line with their pretensions, and perfectly consistent with the conditions they demand. The suspicion will probably remain that there is nothing to prove.

However, as remarked at the outset, I am a friend to Spiritualism, and should be pleased to see it rapidly advance. To this end I hav thought possibly I may aid its progress by supplying a condition by which a test can be made in a public and practical manner. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, no doubt, will render efficient aid by giving all the facts due publication.

I hav a lost brother—Henly L. Burk—who I hav reason for believing died three or four years ago somewhere in the West. I hav used every facility known to the mail service to find out where he died. If there is a realm filled with spirits he is there surrounded by a brigade of relativs. Now, let some medium call him, or some of them, up and tell me where he died. Keep doing things of this kind, hundreds, thousands of them publicly, and you will disarm criticism and doubt will cease. You will cause "a rushing mighty wind." An avalanche of humanity will come pouring into your ranks like a tidal wave, and the carcass of priestcraft will lie helpless and dead at your feet. Besides, who does so will receive a suitable reward at my hands.

THOS. BURK.

Thonghts on Self-Destruction and Fatalism.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Aug. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Ingersoll's article on suicide has been read and reread, and my views on that subject hav for years been in full accord with those expressed by him. It may be a gruesome subject for a less flowery writer than he to touch, but it is one that will not down, for the past and the present show that it is inseparably connected with the record of the human family. It is noticed that Ingersoll is something of a fatalist, and being a complete and thorough fatalist myself, I read with indorsement and approval his words: "Our actions are the fruit, the result of circumstances—of conditions, and we do as we must."

This is so true and so logically indisputable that I wonder it is ever denied; and yet it is. All professed Christians, as far as I know, believe and assert that man is so free to act that he can control his own destiny for good or evil, being, as they claim, a free moral agent.

But facts on every hand go to disprove this, and that man does not exist who is free from the influence of conditions from his first to his last breath. Everybody is the absolute slave of conditions; and under the law of periodicity all great events occur in human affairs without being subject in the slightest degree to the control of mankind. The rise and fall of nations is as natural as the growth and decay of vegetation; and over and over again history repeats itself, and man commits with endless regularity the follies and the sins, the mistakes and the wrongs, of his ancestors. As Voltaire has told us, "man will feel, reason, and act forever as nature has destined," and that individual who thinks he can pursue an independent course through life has failed to giv the subject due and sufficient thought. If a man commits suicide under any circumstances, he does so because driven and forced by conditions he could not avoid or escape. No act, good or bad, is ever committed independently of conditions, and a motiv must first influence the will to produce an act of any kind by the human machine. Let pain and misery in sufficient quantities fall to the lot of any man, and he will seek relief in suicide. I care not what his moral or religious views, for there is a limit to human endurance. But such extreme suffering is so rare that those who take their own lives will always be a very limited minority. We do not, as Voltaire has told us, ever need to fear that suicide will become an epidemic malady; for the alternation of hope and fear under ordinary circumstances will insure the natural death of most people. But under extraordinary circumstances there will always be more or less self-murderers, and statute laws to prevent will be about as sensible and effectiv as the Pope's bull against the comet. Under the universal law of fatalism, where "the facts all touch each other," what conditions produce will occur; and long ago I found out how foolish it was to say I would never do this or that; for necessity compels us to play our automatic parts in strict accord with the conditions that confront and surround, as we march regardless of will or wish ever downward to the grave.

More than one man who has spoken and written against suicide when comparativly happy and prosperous, has afterwards ended his own life; thus demonstrating how weak and uncertain is the action of the human will in the face of changed conditions. Who knows to-day what he will do to-morrow, and who can declare with any certainty coming events in human affairs? No man; and we all grope our way in darkness from the first step to the last one on the journey of life. Every animate thing that livs and breathes, from a mouse to a man is the creature of fate, and is compelled to be and to do precisely what circumstances determin; and though it is true that some men are crushed by conditions that others survive, that fact only shows that different degrees of endurance and resistance prevail among men. The law is not affected in the least. Victor Hugo has said that genius consists in taking fate by surprise; but what is genius but the product of fate? Fate produced the greatest military commander of the ages in the person of Napoleon Bonaparte, and having produced an unusual prodigy, the only surprise that could arise in connection with such a man would be his failure to do something remarkable. We do not expect men of mediocrity to startle the world with great deeds, for under the invariable rule that effect cannot be greater than cause, it is impossible for them to do so. For some unknown reason nature produces very few Shaksperes and Ingersolls, Cæsars and Bonapartes, so when they are produced they rise above their fellowmen like monuments above fence posts; and yet what they do in proportion to their capacity is no more than those who represent the other extreme of human ability. The genius can no more help being great than the man devoid of brains can avoid being an intellectual nonentity, and neither had anything to do with being great or small in body or mind. As we follow up this line of thought we must become more and more convinced of man's automatic relation to the universe, and by this I mean that while the human being is a self-moving machine, all movements are involuntary and in strict accord with outward influences which produce the inward or the mental impulses; for without the five physical senses there would be none. Every thought and every act of mortal man is the result of some influence on his five senses, and these influences make him what he is as a factor in society just the same as soil, water, and sunshine control vegetation. It is true many people think they hav the power of choice between two acts, but when thoroughly analyzed, this power to choose is found to be only the result of the strongest influence. There is no such thing as an independent decision of the will, for the will is merely an instrument of nature's forces in producing human action, and not an independent entity that sits supreme above conditions and influences. The will is under the control of hope and fear, and never works unconstrained by either.

You cannot will without a motiv, said Voltaire, and this undeniable fact shows that motivs must govern all actions; and all motivs being produced by conditions in which we are placed, no logical reasoner can refuse to admit that fatalism accounts for all things and the world is under the reign of inevitable necessity. We love and hate; we fight and fraternize; we laugh and cry, rejoice and curse, invariably as conditions decide; and while playing our automatic parts, some of us get to wondering what it all amounts to. A score of the greatest minds the world ever produced, and whose names will exist as long as human history, shuffled off this mortal coil without waiting for nature to do the job; and I believe the ultimate conclusion of every philosopher, from Aristotle the suicide to Schopenhauer the pessimist, has been honestly expressed by Silenus, who declared "that never to hav been born was the greatest blessing that could happen to man, and the next best thing was to die very soon."

Seneca believed and asserted: "Death is the best invention of nature. What need to lament the particulars? The whole of life is lamentable. New misfortunes will crowd in upon thee before thou hast paid thy debt to the old ones;" and unlimited testimony of this nature might be adduced. But still the world goes round and round, and the human animal continues to propagate his species—very few of whom are philosophers, however—and blind fate insures an endless supply of misery because of having made the globe on which we liv "one vast field of destruction and carnage." Cheerfully yours,

C. SEVERANCE, Pessimistic Fatalist.

P. S.—Should I, under the influence of my Indian control Usquebaugh, write and forward anything not appropriate or desirable for your columns, the same will always fit your waste-basket very nicely, and no harm done; for as old women must talk, so at times some of us must write. As it is customary to criticise your paper at times, and many do by offering valuable suggestions that won't work, will say that the only criticism I hav to offer at present is the following, for otherwise the manner in which you conduct the leading Freethought journal of the globe meets with my unanimous approval.

The little defect to which I call your attention is the woodcut supposed to represent the genial S. P. Putnam. From the mental impression which I still carry of that distinguished exponent of universal mental liberty, I am, and always hav been, unable to find an existing similarity; and, to speak with complete candor, I really think that Samuel has just and legal grounds for instituting—should he feel disposed—a libel suit for gross and exaggerated misrepresentation. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Girl and Little Brook.

"Little brook, little brook, why are yon always singing?"
"Because in early morning all the flower bells are ringing
To waken bees and butterflies, and bid them journey over
The fields through which I flow, where grow the daisies and the clover;
Because the liv-long day the birds from tree to tree are calling,
And now and then in dancing drops the sparkling rain is falling;
Because when comes the night the moon and stars are brightly beami'g
Upon their fair reflections in my silvered waters teeming;
Because I'm happy, little girl, and that is why I'm singing."

'Little brook, little brook, if you find so much gladness;
Why, surely, I should know no single thought of sadness;
For all you hav I hav—green fields and butterflies and flowers,
And bees and birds, and sun and moon and stars, and pleasant showers;
And then I hav—and this is far beyond all other blisses—
A darling mother, little brook, who gives me smiles and kisses."

The True Ambition.

[CONCLUDED.]

Again, further up the scale of social life, is a class of people, independent so far as wealth is concerned, whose sole aim is pleasure—a worldly pleasure. A life of joy is, to them, one of the highest and noblest reasons to liv. This is the class, generally, that make a town or city attractiv; that visit the places of amusement, and gather in opera houses, hearing the most noted of prima-donnas, and applauding what very few of them understand. An individual of rank, or social distinction, makes an innovation, and with an eagerness that is servil and yet pitiable to see, this clique imitates the innovation so as to be "in fashion." There is a good and timely saying by Seneca that "servitude seizes on few, but many seize on her." And must the fads and fopperies of society be called ambition?

There is another class who liv not for self, but for others—for the world; who are a hardy set of people; willing to labor so that humanity may be uplifted; so that the day of peace and enlightenment may come the sooner. Willing to suffer without complaining; happy to endure the scoffs of a cruel world with resignation, but still eager, still willing to push on the fight for humanity's freedom from thraldom, and to make this world the brightest and happiest of worlds, and poverty and suffering almost unknown. They are as conscious of the fact as Massey was when he wrote,

"There's no dearth of kindness
In this world of ours;
Only in our blindness
We gather thorns for flowers."

And they want to teach us that blindness is not a virtue, and that if we would only open our eyes to the possibilities that man can accomplish, instead of picking the thorns of failures, we would pluck the flowers of success and happiness. These reformers are full of love for the race, and

Where falls the tear of love, the rose appears,
And where the ground is bright with friendship's tears
Forget-me-not, and violets heavenly blue,
Spring glittering with the cheerful drops like dew. —Bryant.

They are full of the noblest and highest ambition—to make for the human race a heaven upon earth. To banish forever superstition and all that clogs the wheels of life and makes the burdens the heavier to bear. They are pained at the world's suffering and ignorance, and to banish both is their sincere wish. They see the inconsistencies of man arising out of imperfect manhood, and they want to perfect it. They see and feel his narrow ideas of justice, and they want to broaden them. They note a half-contracted feeling of man toward man called love, and they want this love to be as free and as gentle as the air that sighs on a summer's night through the gentle foliage of the forest. They see and they feel that the tyrant's power is not dead, and they want to stifle it, so that in a land where all are free men and women it can not exist. They see the bane of religion, and they want to banish it and put in its place a clearer conception of duty toward each other. They see men worshiping creations of the imagination, and they want these idols destroyed, and in their place to put the ideal of manhood and womanhood, and to strive for it, not to bow down and worship like idolaters. They are in earnest, deadly so, and their endeavors will not relax until the day of victory has appeared. They are sincere, terribly so, and for this reason they hate hypocrisy. They love the world with all their hearts; they consider that all should be bound together by common ties of affection, and that the sole aim and ambition of every individual should be to labor in the interests of mankind. Beware, ye sluggards, that the day may come too suddenly when man will be free, when parasites will die a natural death, and the enemies of progress and reform will be buried in oblivion's grave. These reformers hav the true ambition. They are full of zeal and believe they can accomplish in due time all they want for the human race.

Press bravely onward!—not in vain
Your generous trust in human kind;
The good which bloodshed could not gain
Your peaceful zeal shall find.

The Locust.

What in the world is that noise?—a whirlwind? No. Then it is a bundle of sticks all on fire. No. What then? Why, it is an army of locusts. See! is the locust not a pretty creature with its three jointed feet, short antennæ, and, on the body of the female you observe four, wedge-shaped pieces, moving up and down. And what are these for? Why, to dig down in the ground a place to deposit eggs.

This is a Carolina locust. Look at its pale yellow, brown body with darkish spots, and strong, black, yellow bordered wings.

Locusts can leap like gymnasts, and fly like the wind. They are of a variety of species, and they can travel like the mischief. How do they make that noise? Now you watch and see. The hind legs are drawn across those big veins of the wing covers, like playing the violin, and in that first segment of the body there is a cavity, which makes the notes sharper.

These little fellows actually swarm in some localities, and are very destructiv too, eating nearly all the grain and destroying vegetation. The red-legged species are the worst, devouring clover, corn, vegetables — everything almost. Truly, they would breed a famin in a little while.

Once there were so many of these little gluttons in New England, and the people were so discouraged, that they appointed a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer to remove them. It did not do any good, however. It would hav been much more sensible to stock the farms with domestic fowls and let them loose upon the locusts.

In some foreign places locusts serve as food for folks. They are fried in fat and are said to be fine; sometimes they are dried, ground up as flour, and made into bread. They are sold by the peck in Arabia. In Africa cattle, as well as birds and men, eat them.

Get your Bibles and read the Old Testament and you will find where they were used as food. The Hebrews were so superstitious that they believed that the locusts were the avenging armies of their Lord. What a strange idea! Other Eastern nations still believe the same and good Arabs will tell you that the story is written in the Arabic language on the wings of these insects! However, nobody can read it but the ignorant Arab.

Turn to the second chapter of the "prophet" Joel and you will find a good description of the locusts and their wild ravages. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Describe the locust? How does it deposit its eggs? How does it produce sound? Are locusts very de tructiv? What did the people in New England do once on account of locusts? What would hav been more sensible? Where are locusts used for food? What did the H brews believe concerning them? Do some nations still believe the same? What do they think is written on the wings of the locust? Repeat the description found in the book of Joel in substance.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Literals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

A great book upon a great subject. In an address before the Triennial Convention of Congregational churches held at Worcester, a reverend gentleman of New York city asked this question: "How can we cure the incorrigible lying of our children?" So bold a question frankly, honestly, and earnestly asked before such an assembly presupposes two conditions in society: 1. A deplorable moral retrogression within the last few decades; 2. An utter failure to check this retrogression by all the appliances of organizations that claim to be the source and the directing influence from and through which all genuin morality flows. The moral status of the nation to-day is a sad commentary on the false theory that it is possible to do wrong with impunity; and is also tangible proof that men will do evil if they are convinced that by a belief in a dogma they are sure of being relieved from all responsibility and the consequences of evil action.

Confidence is the creator of social happiness. Without it society is in a miserable state of unrest. With it society progresses upward and onward to a state of felicity; without it society descends to the pitiable condition of chaotic savagery. From confidence emanates love, which begets that kindly sympathy between man and his fellow man that binds society together in homogeneous bonds. Truthfulness creates confidence, deceit creates distrust.

It is a pertinent inquiry of thoughtful minds to-day, Is society resting in the common repose of confiding trust, or is it in a state of that nervous anxiety born of distrust? If the former, then it is because truthfulness is the prevailing sentiment of society; of this latter, then, we must conclude that it is so prevalent as to be its cause.

An incident in public life may serve to show us what we are in this respect. In the discussions which hav for some time been carried on in Congress over a revenue bill, it was suggested that a tax be imposed upon incomes above four thousand dollars. This proposition was opposed by a large number of Congressmen and by the press generally mostly on the ground that it would fail to bring the revenue anticipated, because of the wholesale perjury it would be sure to entail. These sapient statesmen and writers admitted that such a tax was not deemed onerous, and was a success in Europe, but did not agree with American ideas, thus confessing that we were a nation of liars, and cited in proof statements of Commissioner Wells in regard to the income tax imposed during the war.

Startling as is the question of the clergyman quoted above, the arguments referred to are more startling still. The conduct of children is largely influenced by the conduct of their associates, and as they are at school nine months of the year during the most impressible years of life, much, very much, depends upon the ethical training they receive there. It is to be deeply regretted that the study and practice of morals and manners, distinctivly as such, were, until recently, withdrawn from our public schools, being superseded by what were termed "devotional exercises." Some school officials and teachers seemed to believe that the latter included the former—that a school opened with the formula of prayer, the recitation of scripture texts, and the singing of so-called sacred songs, would be all-sufficient to secure the exemplary conduct of their pupils, and build up a pure and strong character. This was a grave and lamentable error as common observation clearly shows. Else why the constant violation of the immutable laws of ethics? Why the gross manners and lying of many school children? Why the diabolical barbarisms attending the practice of "hazing" in our universities and colleges, which has not unfrequently caused the permanent injury or death of its hapless victims? Why the disfigurement for life of young women at the Wesleyan University of a Western state, where daily attendance on vocal prayers was compulsory, by tattooing their faces in Greek characters with nitrate of silver by their classmates?

Such teachers and officials, it would seem, hav utterly failed to comprehend the ethics of prayer. Montgomery, the hymnologist, declared prayer to be the soul's sincere desire uttered or unexpressed. Prayer, then, is earnest desire. Action is the manifest energy of genuin prayer; therefore right living is prayer vitalized by righteousness. Such prayer is truthful and availeth much; yes, more, it is the all-powerful agent in the building of noble character and the diffusion of happiness broadcast. Such prayer will secure divine favor because it doeth the will of divine goodness.

The perfunctory utterance of a language form by teacher or pupils, or by both, with or without the compulsory formal attitude of the body, becomes monotonous, wearisome, meaningless, and heartless. Such prayer, however well meant, is a mere formality, a vain repetition, and when scanned by the bright light of truth is seen to be a daily enacted lie. Need there be wonder at the lack of high moral qualities in the American character when so much dependence has been placed upon the daily service of the lips and so little upon the rightful action of the individual?

From a long, careful, and unprejudiced observation I hav concluded that teachers too often do not realize the great responsibility resting upon them in forming the character of their pupils. If any position in society deserves to be termed sacred, surely it is that of teachers in our public schools; for no position affords such opportunities for molding the human character. How she shall accomplish her task fully and faithfully in this regard furnishes by far the most difficult problem she is called upon to solve.

And now, when the trend of events seems to immutably indicate that much more will be required at her hands in the field of applied ethics, "Right Living," by the well-known authoress, Susan H. Wixon, comes as an invaluable aid to assist her in this noble work. Miss Wixon possesses the rare and happy faculty of writing in such a lucid, fluent style that her productions, while fascinating to the young, deeply interest the mind of mature years; hence "Right Living," although especially designed as a text-book in oral instruction and supplementary reading in the schoolroom, is a fitting work to grace the private and bless the patrons of the public library. Its great truths are tersely stated in strong and forceful language, condensed into short, axiomatic paragraphs which render it easy for the memory to seize and retain them. It has a copious index, which renders it convenient to select any topic which occasion may demand or the taste of the reader may require. It is entirely free from religious bias, the author evidently subordinating all prejudicial leanings, if she possessed any, to the one great end of demonstrating the truth and showing how it should be adopted and cherished in right living to adorn the character and thereby build up a noble manhood and womanhood.

A book so replete with wisdom should be in the hands of every teacher as well as in every home in the land. J. W.

Gems of Thought.

MAN can take no medicin that will cure a bad religion.—Investigator.

CHANGE must come. But how? The corporation, the capitalist, the representativs of the masses, are strenuously urging revolution by stimulating hatred, desperation, distrust; the people, by moral, peaceful, persistent agitation, are struggling against the awful approaching termination of the industrial problem and the purification of the body politic.—Weekly Index, Boston.

THE higher the social evolution, the more does this inner element of ceremonial rule grow, while the outer formal element dwindles. As fast as the principles of natural politeness seen to originate in sympathy, distinguish themselvs from the code of ceremonial within which they originate, they replace its authority by a higher authority, and go on dropping its non-essentials while developing further its essentials. —Herbert Spencer.

Is not our universal method of speaking of time in units of centuries, years, and hours, rather too impersonal and misleading to us in our efforts to grasp the idea of lapse of time in our own lives? Should we not rather measure it in pulse beats, or heart throbs, or life strokes, and would not this then lead us to a more close knowledge of the existence of ourselvs in relation to the world and our duties as the days roll by?—Albert Gresswell, M.D.

CHARITY is an outrage against the individual. As such it stands condemned. Charity takes from the veins of personality its most precious blood. The gallows, the guillotine, the garrote, here witness their spiritual counterparts. Justice speaks in defense of the individual. It fends him. It makes whole that which previously was only a part. It builds muscle and mind, it fits soul and body for long journeys and the ineffable victories of personality. Charity is a mole. Justice soars to the heavens, and is not dazzled by the sun. Charity livs in holes its brief and shadowed second; justice measures itself with all space and time.—Horace L. Traubel.

"BUT there are some, like Carlyle, who, practically speaking, shuffle off the theological idea and yet retain the ascetic creed." Yea, verily, there are. At least, there are who fancy they do. But people like this only think they think; their proposition, when you come fair and square face to face with it, is absolutely unthinkable. Carlyle was the inheritor of a brain and nervous system begotten and moulded by Calvinism. He got rid of the foundations of the Calvinistic belief, but he never was logical enough to get rid of the superstructure. He knocked away the tortoise that supports the elephant that bears the world on his back, but he left the elephant himself still gracefully poised in vacuo.—Grant Allen.

WHY either Optimism or Pessimism? These, let us remember, are superlativ terms—i. e., terms expressing extremes. Suppose, now, that, instead of trying to put an extreme interpretation of one kind or the other, on the universe, we content ourselvs with trying to see it as it is What do we find? A condition of things of which the best, I think, we can say is, that it is improving, while it is capable of indefinit improvement right now, in our own time. This is the modest, untheological doctrin of Meliorism. Far from asserting a world at its best, all things considered, it asserts a world whose capacity for immediate and indefinit betterment should rouse every human being to unselfish exertion. It is as stirring and thrilling as the other is soothing and benumbing. It arrays before the conscience the sorrows and sufferings of our brethren, and bids us remember that we can do our part to lessen the amount of human woe. —William H. Johnson, in Conservator.

THEOLOGIANS (however they may "officially" deny it) hav for years been busy in rereading their creeds and adjusting them to the new sciences. The theological readjustment, made necessary by the Darwinian doctrin and the general doctrin of evolution, has not been less important than that required by the changed conditions of the Copernican astronomy. The heresy of a few, who held God to be the immanent, indwelling, and eternal life of all the universe of men and things, is now the gospel of a great and ever-greatening company. This rereading of the natural world, and of the theological system corresponding to the mechanical conception of the world, implied the utter and complete inadequacy of the traditional belief in Christianity as a supernatural revelation. Subjected to the new natural science and philosophy, and likewise to the new and higher criticism, the Bible, neither in the record nor in what is recorded, anywhere givs a hint or sign of supernatural interference or action, unless all natural things are supernatural, in virtue of the immanent divinity. —Banner of Light.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

By Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B.

CONTENTS:

BOOK I.—PLEASURE: Chap. I.—Sources of Pleasure. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasure. Chap IV—Social Pleasures. Chap. V—Pleasures of the Savage, the Barbarian and the Civilized. Chap. VI.—Genesis of religions. Chap. VII.—Christianity.

BOOK II.—INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Purpose of life. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures: Knowledge. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Reason. Chap.—V. Ideal Pleasures: Character. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Pedagogical Despotism.

BOOK III.—MORAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Morality. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures: Prudence. Chap. III.—Material Pleasures: Refinement. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Foresight, Chap. V.—Ideal Pleasures: Civilization. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Vice Caused by Restraint.

BOOK IV.—SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Progress. Chap. II.—Protection, Capitalism, and Socialism: Respectivly an Actual, an Imminent, and a Proposed Violation of Individual Sovereignty. Chap. III—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism. Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject with out much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. The book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for its bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

LITTLE Minnie had a new frock. When she went to bed her mother told her to say, "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep." "I pray the Lord my clothes to keep," said little Minnie, nor could she be induced to alter this improved form of prayer.

FARMER: "You had a fire at the manse this morning. Any serious loss?" Minister: "Yes, ten years' sermons were completely burned." Farmer (with the memory of many a weary Sunday morning): "Mon, they had made a gran' blaze, they were so dry, ye ken."

A FRIEND, whom we will call Mr. Smith, was visiting the wife of a farmer. Mr. Smith: "How is your husband now?" Mrs. Brown: "Worse than ever; he's got a new bolus, which is tearing him to bits. But he's never well. How can a man be well whose inside is as full of pills as a peas-pod of peas? I often say to him: 'John, it's just flying in the face of providence when you've got your lawful regular doctor within a mile of you, and you going off to these impostors [impostors].'" Mr. Smith: "It's certainly very foolish." Mrs. Brown: "Foolish! it's all that—but it's far worse; it's downright wicked. It beats me how a man can go down on his knees in church and pray against such nastiness, and then go back like a dog to his vomit again." Mr. Smith: "And does he pray in church against quacks?" Mrs. Brown: "Of course he does. Don't we pray against them every Sunday in the litany? Don't we pray against 'all false doctorin [doctrin]'"—London Spectator.

HOW A DRUMMER CAUGHT TWO MINISTERS ON AN EASY QUESTION.

Abashed at nothing, a commercial traveler in the South once propounded a question to a couple of clergymen, whom he encountered on a railroad train, which illustrates how easily a man may be tripped on a simple little "catch" problem.

The drummer entered into a conversation with the ministers and entertained them amazingly with his brilliant remarks, touching men and affairs. Gradually the topic changed, until at last the talk was of Dr. Talmage and his visit to the Holy Land.

"Speaking of the Holy Land," said the graceless commercial man, "I was quite interested to read in a New York paper recently that a party of explorers in Palestine had discovered a huge heap of bones, which, from their size and quantity, are supposed to be of the children which Herod ordered killed. They were found in a cave which had been closed for centuries, which accounts for their preservation."

"Indeed!" replied one of the clergymen, much interested. "I had not heard of it. It is certainly a surprising discovery."

"Yes," continued the drummer, "and oddly enough, while nearly half of the bones are bleached white, the rest were as black as ebony."

"Remarkable," ejaculated the clergyman who had already spoken, while the other looked at the drummer suspiciously.

"What is your theory?" continued the drummer. "Do you think it possible that the bleached bones could be those of males and the black of females?"

"Possibly," replied the more communicativ clergyman. "I am not an anatomist, however, and can't say what effect long exposure has on the bones of the sexes."

"And you?" persisted the drummer to the other. "What is your opinion? Do you think it possible that the white bones belong to male infants and the black to female, or vice versa? That is the problem that now excites the discoverers."

"Really," replied the other, "I don't know, but possibly as you first put it, the white bones may be of the male children and the black of the female."

Shortly after this the clergymen reached their destination and left the train. Just as it was about moving off the drummer, who had been chuckling to himself the meanwhile, thrust into the hand of one a card, upon which was written the words:

"Excuse me if I suggest that you read your Bibles hereafter with greater care. Had you done so in the past, you would hav known that boy babies only were ordered slain by Herod."

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. THE Vermont election resulted in Republican victory by a large majority, amounting to 28,000 over all. Urban A. Woodbury is chosen governor.

THE Comte de Paris, head of the French House of Orleans, died in London last week. He was the son of the late Duc d'Orleans, and grandson of Louis Phillippe, king of the French. He was born Aug. 24, 1838. He served on the staff of General McClellan during the early years of our Civil War.

THE Maine election has gone Republican. Governor Cleaves is reëlected by a majority of probably 25,000 to 30,000. It may be larger, Chairman Manley claiming 37,000.

THE Republicans of the Second district of West Virginia selected Alston G. Dayton to oppose William L. Wilson, the Democratic tariff leader, in the congressional race.

THE police board of this city has dismissed Captain Stephenson for bribery, and also voted to abolish the office of precinct detectiv. Central office men will hereafter do such detectiv work as may be necessary.

THE Democrats of Wisconsin hav renominated Governor George W. Peck. The platform warmly indorses the administration and denounces the Democratic Senators who so vitally amended the Wilson tariff bill.

"Is Suicide a Sin?" and "Is Bicycling Immodest?" are the two questions most earnestly discussed in some of the New York papers. To one who believes in the referendum most of the letters must be very discouraging.

THE National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic was held at Pittsburg this week. Thousands reached the city last Sunday, greatly to the disgust of the Sundayites, whose headquarters are in that unfortunate town.

THE Minnesota Democratic convention indorsed the national platform, declared its confidence in the administration, called for the election of United States Senators by the people, denounced the American Protectiv Association, and nominated George L. Becker for governor.

THE police justices of this city hold court often with locked doors, in direct violation of the law of the state. Men and women hav often to lie in jail all night, because their friends and bondsmen can not get in to arrange for bail, thus subjecting them to needless inconvenience and ignominy, and many others to serious loss of time.

THE Louisiana sugar planters hav resolved to hereafter support the Republican party because the Democrats hav repealed the sugar bounty. Governor Foster, himself a sugar producer, protests strongly against this step, arguing that the planters can win nothing without the support of the negroes, and to bid for their assistance will reintroduce the race problem in its worst form.

THE Colorado Populists renominated Governor Davis H. Waite, although his opponents made as strong a fight as they could against him, with all the machinery of the convention in the hands of his friends. It now seems probable that Thomas M. Patterson, editor of the Rocky Mountain News, the leading Populist paper of the country, will bolt the nomination.

IN the congress of the English trades unions a prolonged debate ensued upon a resolution to nationalize all lands containing mines or minerals. James Keir Hardie, M.P., moved an amendment that, besides the land, the whole means of production, distribution, and exchange of the output of mines ought to be nationalized. The amended resolution was carried by a vote of 219 to 61.

THE Northwest Legislature (Canada) has decided the long disputed school question, for a time, at least. It has voted that the Catholics shall not be deprived of their right to establish separate schools, and, in districts where they maintained such separate schools, shall not also be taxed for the public schools. It has been determined, further, that the only religous exercises in the public schools shall be the simple reading of the Lord's Prayer at the opening.

THE Memphis grand jury has discovered that the six negroes lynched near that city for alleged incendiarism were the victims of a plot to which the detectiv who had them under his care, and the driver of the wagon which became the butchers' shambles, were probably parties. That the prisoners were to be murdered was known in Memphis to certain persons many hours before the slaughter took place. The sextuple murder made six widows and twenty-seven orphans. The grand jury has indicted several persons for the crime.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

WHAT THE PULPIT PARROT WANTS WITH THE LAY MONKEYS.

About Books.

Since the Truth Seeker Company's compositors got "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" off their hands they hav not been idle. We hav undertaken the issuing of two new books, which are now in press, the first in order of time being "The Better World," by Dr. E. B. Southwick, of Michigan. This is not, as might be inferred from its title, a religious work having the heavenly beatitudes for its theme, but deals in a unique way with the possibilities of complete happiness on this mundane sphere when men and women shall hav learned to lead natural lives and to adopt scientific government and regulations. In the world which he describes there are no soldiers, lawyers, doctors, preachers, or public schools, and as a coincidence no war, litigation, disease, superstition, or ignorance.

The second new book is by Mr. F. D. Cummings, of Maine, the title being "Religion and the Bible." Mr. Cummings is a business man, and, we judge, a prosperous one. Our dealings with him certainly indicate that he is one of thorough business methods. And he has expressed his views on religion and the Bible with the terseness, clearness, and precision that characterize commercial paper. Perhaps he is the first resident of Maine to write such a book. If so, that state has made a good, though tardy, beginning.

Announcement of the appearance of these books will be made at an early day. The price is fifty cents each, in paper covers. Meanwhile we hav a suggestion to make to the substantial men in the Freethought ranks: You hav knowledge and views that are worthy of preservation in a bound volume.

Why not, then, write a book?

In view of the disputes that arise concerning every prominent man's religious belief, after he is dead, a record over his own hand has become a necessity—almost a duty. If his family or immediate friends do not agree with him, they are likely, at his death, to accord him religious burial, deny all truthful accounts of his actual convictions, and destroy whatever newspaper articles or private writing from his pen might prove him to hav been a Freethinker; while his obituary, tombstone, and epitaph will perpetuate the falsehood that he has "fallen asleep in Jesus." The course we hav suggested—the publication of a book, if no more than an autobiography, to be a part of his last will and testament—will render such a fate impossible. And there are other advantages of authorship which will readily suggest themselvs.

In further elaboration of this subject we would say that the Truth Seeker Company is in the printing and publishing business, and possesses all the facilities for turning out first-class work. Any faults of composition due to an author's unfamiliarity with literary labors are corrected by competent revision. This Company's imprint upon a publication insures it a home in the book world, while our advantages for securing it circulation among the class it is intended to reach are not enjoyed by any other house. We believe that the Truth Seeker Company's claim to be the headquarters for all Liberal literature is conceded Our terms are as low as those of any other house that does good work and pays standard wages. As we inquired before, Why not publish a book?

It is evident that President Putnam of the Freethought Federation is keeping a close watch on men and events from his conning tower in Chicago. He means to hav a good Congress in October and to keep every company and regiment in line for efficient work against the theocratic foe. His most enthusiastic and useful allies are the thousand good and true men and women who subscribed for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Only those who know what has been suffered in the world-old battle for liberty and what has been won, can fully realize the magnitude of the task yet to be performed and the need of united, persistent, and intelligent action. The numbers of this select corps are steadily if slowly increasing, and now we are at last able to announce that the end of waiting is here. After a tremendous struggle with our printers the last form went to press this week and the book is in the hands of the binder. As soon as we receive it from him it will be rushed out to the subscribers as fast as we can wrap, direct, and ship the great volume. The names following are those of subscribers received since last week: Georgia, B. A. Denmark; Illinois, W. G. Reichwald.

THE Friendship Liberal League, George Longford, secretary, meets at 2:30 and 7:30, every Sunday in Warner's Hall, Broad and Wallace streets, Philadelphia Freethought publications are on sale at the meetings.

The Sunday Superstition and the Schools.

Our readers are familiar with the intention of the theocrats to secure, if possible, the incorporation in public school text-books of articles favoring compulsory Sunday observance. They hav taken hold of the work in earnest and will push it with the vigor and wise system which characterize all their propagandism. Their organs urge upon theocrats everywhere in the country the duty and necessity of writing to school-book publishers and presenting to them all possible arguments that may hav the effect of inducing the publishers to prepare and issue series of text-books suitable for the accomplishment of the purpose of the Covenanters, that is, the indoctrination of the minds of the children of the land with the dogmas and principles of the Sunday superstition and tyranny. They are committed squarely and unreservedly to the proposition that it is a part of the business of the state to teach religion, and their kind of religion, as a matter of course. Equally of course, they are absolutely sure that the state has an unquestionable right to enact Sunday laws. Nay more, they are convinced that it is its bounden duty to establish such laws. It is right here that we must meet them firmly and without reservation. If the state has the right to enact Sunday statutes it has the right to enforce them, and in order that it may enforce them with the least possible friction it will teach the children of all citizens, who in their turn are to be citizens, that those statutes are necessary, just, and must be obeyed. If Sunday statutes are justifiable on any ground, then it is entirely proper that the children in the public schools and in all other schools be told wherein they are justifiable and why they are justifiable. It will not do to play fast and loose with this momentous issue. The state directs the education of our children, and while it does it must insist, in self-defense, that these children be taught to render obedience to its laws. Its right to instruct the rising generation to respect its laws is conterminous with its right to adopt those laws. If there be any law already in existence which it may not teach the pupils in the schools to obey, that law should be repealed. The state may warn against murder and arson, for murder and arson are violations of the law of equal freedom, and therefore invasiv, hence the state may rightfully deal compulsorily with the murderer and incendiary. Work and play on Sunday are not violations of the law of equal freedom, therefore not invasiv, and hence the state cannot rightfully punish them as crimes nor teach that they are crimes.

Furthermore, evén if the advocates of Sunday observance did not desire to force their ideas concerning it upon dissenters by means of legal enactments, the teaching of those ideas in the public schools would be unconstitutional and invasiv, for there should be no union of church and state, and to teach in the schools that Sunday is a holy day, the observance of which is enjoined by God, is to propagate a religious dogma at the expense of the taxpayers holding to all forms of belief and non-belief.

The question of Sunday observance is one for private determination wholly, equally with that of baptism, partaking of the communion, respecting fast days, making pilgrimages to shrines, shaving the head, or saying grace at the table. The state has nothing whatever to do with any of these rites, ceremonies, and observances, beyond protecting all in the equal right to engage in or abstain therefrom. This is what separation of church and state means, this is what secularization involves; this is what the advocates of the law-fettered Sunday, this is what all theocrats, hate and fight against. Right here the battle line is drawn, right here the war is to be waged.

The Christian Reformer, replying indirectly to our arguments against state teaching of Sunday observance dogmas, quotes from an address by Bishop Whipple, in which that church dignitary, after enumerating a number of the frightful evils which assail or threaten the country, says concerning the asserted cause of these perils:

> "For the past quarter of a century the apostles of Infidelity hav by press and platform been eating faith out of the hearts of men; multitudes hav forgotten that no nation has ever survived the loss of its religion. It may hav been a poor religion, but when men hav lost all sense of accountability to a higher power, when they hav admitted no eternal standard of righteousness, and limited man's horizon to the grave, society has perished."

It is now in order for Bishop Whipple to tell us what nation, using "nation" as synonymous with people, has lost "all sense of accountability to a higher power." Within the historic period, no nation which has gone down in ruin had any lack of faith in a higher power or in higher powers. If by nation he means the government, it is pertinent to remind him that ours is the first whose constitution guaranteed the complete and perpetual separation of politics and religion, and left the people absolutely free to cherish and giv expression to their sense of accountability to higher powers. So far our nation has "survived," while all the dangers that it has encountered and surmounted are clearly traceable to sources other than the principle of secularization embodied in its fundamental law. Indeed, we may fairly go much further than this and maintain that but for the disregard of this principle by our municipal and state goverments, and even by the federal government, we should hav escaped many grave perils. By the exemption of church property from taxation the way was opened for the accumulation of vast properties in the hands of ecclesiastical organizations, an accumulation which has never failed to be detrimental to the welfare of the state and inimical to the interests of all its industrious citizens. The admission of the Bible to the public schools has made possible the "Catholic menace" to the common school system, and has paved the way for this later theocratic demand that the orthodox Christian belief concerning Sunday be taught in those schools. One of the greatest evils with which we hav to deal, and which is eating into the very vitals of all that is honorable, true, and just, is political corruption, and much of this is directly chargeable to the scheming of the theocrats. The attempt to subvert the secular Constitution has contributed powerfully to the unmanning of politicians. They hav been bullied into voting for all sorts of unconstitutional laws, and hav made all kinds of promises under duress of threats of defeat in future elections if they do not giv their public indorsement to the demands of the theocrats. They hav seen misleading and even forged petitions laid upon their desks, and they hav not dared to expose the fraud, but hav had to make believe that they saw nothing wrong, and hav talked and voted as though they had not the slightest doubt of the truth of the theocrats' assertion that those documents actually expressed the solemn wish of a vast majority of the people. These are but three examples of the many dangers and iniquities which all clear-sighted and good citizens fear and lament, and which cannot be debited to the constitutional inhibition of the union of church and state, but which, on the contrary, are undoubtedly justly chargeable to the machinations of the Christian enemies of that wise provision against ecclesiastical encroachments and tyranny.

Immediately following its quotation from Bishop Whipple, the Christian Reformer says:

"In the light of all the facts, there is nothing more reasonable or more patriotic than the proposition to insert in our school readers lessons on Sabbath observance. · · · It is largely by means of this institution [Sunday] that 'the sense of accountability to a higher power' has been developed. The Sabbath law is part of that law written by the finger of God on tables of stone."

This is begging the question. Whether God wrote any law; whether, if he did, he wrote it on a table of stone; whether, if he did so write, we hav any sure means of knowing the fact, and finally whether there is or was a God who could or did write a Sabbath law or any law on a table of stone or elsewhere, are all theological questions with which the state has nothing whatever to do. It can neither legislate, adjudicate, nor administer upon the assumption of the truth of an affirmativ answer to one or all of these questions. They are wholly without the domain of politics. The state stands for the defense of the civil rights of all its citizens, regardless of their opinions concerning these or any other religious tenets. It is not a council, presbytery, synod, conference, nor board of Bible interpretation or revision. Its functions are secular, not ecclesiastical. For the state to put into the school readers what the theocrats want there is to assume the existence of a God and his direct intervention in human affairs, the divinity and infallibility of the Bible, and its own right to legislate in regard to religious beliefs. This is precisely what the National Reformers and their allies desire, and they seem stone blind to the fact that all history is eloquent with warning against such a domination of the lawmaker by the priest. That this theocratic demand for religious instruction in the schools and for the incorporation of Theistic and Christian dogmas in the laws is based on theological instead of on humanitarian grounds is well-known to all intelligent observers of current events, in spite of the frantic protestations to the contrary of the more discreet champions of the Covenanter schemes and of the less cautious themselvs in their calmer or shrewder moments, but it will not be amiss to quote here a few sentences from the Christian Reformer, which are strongly confirmatory of this observation:

"There is but one remedy for all these national ills, and that is a return to the religion of our fathers. This cannot be done without a proper regard for the Sabbath. There must be a cessation of all unnecessary trade and travel on the Lord's day. This cannot be brought about unless the youth of our land are taught the command, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.' They must he taught that this is not a mere humanitarian law, discovered by science to be good for man physically, but that it has the authority of God behind it and that men and nations disobey it at their peril. They must be taught that God commands nations to keep the Sabbath, and threatens them with destruction if they refuse. 'If ye will not hearken unto me to hallow the Sabbath day, and not to bear a burden even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched.'"

For some reason we hav been seeing less of the "rest" pretense lately in the Sabbatarian papers than we hav been accustomed to finding therein. Is it supposable that they are awakening to the fact that it is a very thin disguise, not likely to fool people of fair intelligence, and that this eye-opening has been brought about by THE TRUTH SEEKER'S demonstration of the utter lack of necessity for Sunday laws in the interest of working people, who can secure all the leisure they need without a single statute of the kind? It will be comparativly easy to put the Covenanters to rout when they are once forced out into the open and compelled to admit on all occasions that they are fighting for Sunday laws solely in the interest of the church. It is this consideration which causes us to devote so much space to the establishment of the truth of our contention that no special Sunday laws are needed in order to giv all time for rest. If further proof were needed that the Sunday observance people are working in the interest of the church instead of the worker, it would be found in their unrelenting opposition to all forms of Sunday recreation and amusement. Here they completely unmask.

A Frank Admission—A Startling Comparison.

THE TRUTH SEEKER said recently that "we fight from the vantage ground of the Constitution," and it is strictly true, although it is a Constitution ignored, violated, and trampled. To the fact that the Constitution is what it is do we owe all the religious liberty that the legislator of modern days has left to us. We must see to it that no Christian constitutional amendment is grafted on to the noble instrument, for when that is accomplished we are lost. It is clearly perceived by the National Reformers and their congeners that the Constitution is the greatest obstruction in their way, and they are sure to make use of every obtainable lever in their desperate endeavor to remove it. Of course some of the theocrats claim that the genius of the nation is Christian and that a Christian amendment would be in perfect harmony with the religious customs and legislation of the past, and would also harmonize with the truest reading of the Constitution in the light of the real intentions of the fathers, but the more logical and clear-seeing of their leaders are forced to confess that, so far as the Constitution is concerned, they are the innovators and must maintain an aggressiv fight. Rev. E. Thompson, D.D., of Los Angeles, California, preached a sermon the other day in Pittsburg on the theme, "Is this a Christian Nation?" He claimed that it is. He said that the men, women, and children at home prayed for the success of the soldiers in the field; that in the national convention Franklin acknowledged God as the ruler of nations, and moved that a minister be sent for to ask God's blessing on the convention; that the president at his inauguration takes an oath, and that "twenty-six decisions of the supreme courts of as many states hav said that this is a Christian nation." He also said: "The Constitution of the United States is distinctivly a Christian document." The Christian Reformer, while expressing its admiration of the "spirit and aim" of this discourse, feels compelled to point out some of the speaker's errors. Here are some of its admissions:

"The reference to Benjamin Franklin's speech and motion in the constitutional convention is incomplete and may leave a wrong impression. The reader might infer that the motion for prayers in the convention was adopted, when the fact is a motion to adjourn was carried without taking a vote on Franklin's motion, and it was never brought up again. Franklin himself tells us that the convention, with the exception of three or four persons, thought prayers unnecessary. The assertion that 'the Constitution of the United States is a Christian document,' must not be allowed to go unchallenged. We meet it with the counter-statement that the Constitution of the United States is not a Christian document. · · · The statement as to the inauguration oath of the president calls for one or two remarks. The exact form of the oath is prescribed in the Constitution. It is as follows: 'I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of the president of the United States, and to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.' There is no recognition of God in this oath, and the president, as a rule, takes it just as it is here given. It appears, therefore, that while there is a large amount of Christianity in the nation, and a small amount in the laws and in the administration, the Constitution is not a distinctivly Christian document. All the Christianity found in the statutes, customs, usages, thanksgiving proclamations, etc., is extra-constitutional."

That is, all the Christian features of our local, state, and national governments are illegal, unconstitutional, rebellion-tainted. Thus much for the admission; now for the comparison:

"But in any case it impresses us as a strange state of affairs, when the Christianity of the Constitution has to be proved. [And after all is not proved.] There should be no need of proof. It ought to be so manifest that there could be no doubt about its existence. What would hav been the impression made on the public if Dr. Thompson had taken an hour to prove that the Methodist church is a Christian church? Common sense people would say, If the Christianity of the Methodist church is so vague, ambiguous, and doubtful that it needs to be proved, that church ought to hold a general conference forthwith and revise its creed, so that its Christianity will be known and read of all men. That is the duty now resting on this nation with reference to its Constitution."

Of all the comparisons that do not compare, this may safely claim the palm. We find ourself wondering if the editor of the Christian Reformer realizes how completely he has exposed his front, flank, and rear—every face and angle of his position—to his enemies' attack. It seems utterly impossible for thorough-going theocrats to understand that a church and a civil government are two distinct and separate things. Can they not grasp the idea that the functions of the two are wholly different? The mission of the Methodist church is to uphold and propagate Christianity; the purpose of this government is to defend its citizens—to render secure their property, persons, and lives. The Methodist church has a religious creed because it is a religious society; the nation has a political constitution because it is a political organization. The one is a declaration of religious belief; the other is a bill of civil rights. It is well that the Christianity of the church is "known and read of all men." It would not be well if the Christianity of the Constitution were known and read of all men, for the Constitution should hav no Christianity nor any other religion or irreligion to be known or read of any man. The man who calls the Constitution a "creed" and proposes to revise into it the dogmas of Christianity is, whether consciously or unconsciously it matters little, the enemy of civil and religious liberty, and would, if it were in his power, bring back the days of the Inquisition, with his church grasping the sword of merciless authority. We earnestly wish to preserve the amenities of discussion, and we desire to reason rather than denounce; but when an editor puts into cold type the atrocious assertion that it is the duty of the people of the United States to make the Constitution of the nation a creed of Christianity, so plain and pronounced in its averments that no one can mistake it for anything else, we find it difficult to refrain from such denunciation as the anti-slavery apostles heaped upon the heads of the apologists for chattel servitude.

Will You Be There?

We hope to meet a multitude of Truthseekers at the Annual Congress of the Freethought Federation and Secular Union in Chicago in October. All Freethinkers who can spare the time and money will, we are sure, be amply repaid their outlay of both, if they attend. None of us touches hands often enough with his fellow-workers. We are so deeply engrossed with the everyday duties of life that there is little time left or opportunity given for the cultivation of social feelings and the exchange of fraternal greetings. But once a year we can get together under the rooftree of our national organization and relax the tense nerves strained almost to the breaking point in the struggle for existence. We get out of the old ruts, and breathe a new atmosphere. Old friendships are freshened and strengthened and new ones are formed. We review the struggles and triumphs of the year. We hope and plan for the future.

Of course we cannot get together a crowd of thousands or tens of thousands, as the Women's Christian Temperance Union people or the Christian Endeavorers do, for our propaganda attracts only the independent and thoughtful. But there will be a sufficient number at the coming Congress to hav a splendid time, and we can hav no doubt that the meeting will giv a fruitful stimulus to the work all over the country, and especially in all districts represented in the Congress by home delegates. The Chicago friends are not in the habit of doing things by halves, and this year they are reinforced by Mr. Putnam, who is an unconquerable host in himself. His enthusiasm is contagious, and he has an almost unlimited capacity for hard work, which he draws upon without stint when he makes up his mind that a job is worth doing. Then there is Judge Waite, who wrote that admirable work, the history of the first two hundred years of the Christian religion, and who is the president of the Secular Union, which this year foregathers with the Freethought Federation in this annual congress. Judge Waite and Mrs. Waite are good people to know, and they are a tower of strength to our cause in the city by the inland sea. Reichwald, Peacock, and many other intrepid soldiers of Liberalism are doing valiant service on the picket line, and will hav everything in good shape for the Congress by the time the outside delegates arrive.

It is not necessary to enumerate here the important questions that will come up for consideration; suffice it to say that never has there been greater need for vigilance, energy, union, and aggressivly defensiv fighting.

Come from East and West and North and South; make this Congress an all-around success.

We are told that the Lord loveth a cheerful giver, so no doubt he has a warm place in his heart for that unique Freethinker, Charles Broadway Rouss, of this city, who has just sent to our Acting Mayor McClellan a check for $1,000 for the Minnesota fire sufferers.

On the last Sunday in September the Brooklyn Philosophical Association will go out to New Rochelle to see the Paine monument and ascertain what, if any, improvements need to be made. The members of the association will leave the Grand Central station in this city on the 1 P.M. train or the first that leaves after that hour. They expect to hav an entertaining and instructiv time and cordially invite friends from other cities to join them.

A Cleveland paper, which is helping on the Sunday crusade in that city, tells a story that concerns the former mayor of the town. It is to the effect that a church delegation waited on the official to see if something could not be done to lessen the noise in a saloon which was next-door neighbor to the church. The merry-making in the saloon disturbed the services in the church, it was stated. Then the mayor asked: "Did it ever occur to you that the people in the saloon are probably disturbed by your singing, as much as you are by their merry-making?" We are not concerned to inquire here as to the relativ harmfulness or innocuousness of the two kinds of "noise," but the question of his honor may not be quite so "brazen" as the Sunday law paper seems to think it is. It is barely possible that the habitués of the saloon may be disturbed by a noise different from that which they make themselvs, and that, under the law of equal freedom, they would be entitled to some consideration at the hands of the lawmakers. If we assume that the sounds produced by church services are privileged while all those made in the saloon are to be outlawed, of course there is nothing to be said in defense or extenuation of the mayor's question, but if it is admitted that each citizen is entitled to complain of the sounds that annoy him, the question is presented in a new aspect, and the problem is seen to be one which calls for the exercise of mutual forbearance and the granting of mutual concessions. If statute law is to be called in to arbitrate, it must be law applicable to all days alike; no special enactments for Sunday are required.

The opportunity is now presented for what we hope will be effectiv work in behalf of state secularization. As our readers are aware, Congress has passed an act admitting Utah into the Union as a state, and she will come in in 1896. A constitution had been adopted before the enabling act was passed, but it is now proposed to amend it, and a constitutional convention has been called for that purpose. Already the clergy are at work, determined to secure the election of none but Christians as delegates, if possible. They see an opening for the incorporation of their religious opinions in the organic law of the new state. We must meet them in every district and in the convention. The Territory must be flooded with our literature. It will not do to permit the theocrats to gain a foothold there. Delegates who will stand immovably firm in opposition to all schemes for the recognition of religious dogmas in the constitution, should be nominated, and we are well satisfied that a majority of this kind can be elected. When the convention assembles the Freethinkers must be on the ground from the first. "Who would be free, themselvs must strike the blow." To keep a good man there, and put into the hands of the delegates plenty of printed arguments in support of church taxation, against Sunday laws, and for completely secular education, will take money and we now ask the Freethinkers of the whole country to contribute to "The Utah Fund." Let us resolve to make Utah a free state. Mr. George Larson, who livs out there, has opened the ball without being asked, and sends us one dollar for the purpose named. Who will be the next? Will friends please send us papers from Utah whenever any contain anything about the convention that can possibly be of any use in this connection? Keep us well informed in regard to events and we will do all we can at this end of the line.

The time rapidly approaches when Mr. J. B. Wise must appear for trial in the United States court at Topeka for sending through the mails a transcript of a "verse" of the Bible. We hope it will not be forgotten by the friends that trials in United States courts cost heavily and that Mr. Wise is a very poor man who stands greatly in need of their timely assistance. That the letters to the officials are read and pondered is shown by the following card sent to us by one of the best workers we hav. Read it, and then giv United States District Attorney W. C. Perry of Topeka an opportunity to send you a more satisfactory communication. And please do what you can to help Mr. Wise in a financial way. Here is Mr. Groh's card:

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Sept. 3, 1894.

"MR. EDITOR: That letters from the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps are not disregarded is evident from the fact that, in response to a postal, I this morning received the following from United States District Attorney W. C. Perry, of Topeka, Kansas, saying: 'Referring to your postal card of the 22d inst., I beg to say that the charge against J. B. Wise was presented to the grand jury and an indictment returned against him. This of itself requires me to present the case to a trial jury, unless I am convinced that the charge is unfounded in fact and in law. This conclusion I am unable to arrive at. The circumstances under which Mr. Wise is said to hav mailed the postal card are such that in my opinion he violated the law.'"

There is no doubt that all the regular readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will carefully peruse Samuel P. Putnam's ringing protest against the foolish resolutions adopted and sent to President Cleveland by the convention lately in session at Topeka. It is utterly incomprehensible how—in face of the tremendous issues that confront us as Freethinkers—these people could go off at that tangent into the slough of partisan politics. We hav our own work to do, more than we can attend to properly with the limited resources at our command, and it is fatuous to waste our strength in attacks on any party, and thus inevitably create ill-feeling and antagonism in our own ranks—unless that party has, as a party, invited the attack by making war on the principles for which all organizations that rightly bear the Freethought name stand, and can alone stand. Had the Kansans censured President Cleveland for any official utterance or act of his which was violativ of the basic principles of secularization, they would hav merited only commendation from all Freethinkers, for to expose and condemn the words and works of officials which discriminate against some citizens and in favor of others because of differences of opinion regarding religion, is an important duty of every Freethought society. As an individual, every Freethinker is at perfect liberty to form such political affiliations as he chooses and to address to the officers of the government such communications as he thinks they should receive. But when any Liberal organization does as the one in Kansas has done, it goes entirely outside the sphere of its legitimate work, very seriously impairs its own usefulness, and casts odium upon and does grave harm to every other Freethought body in the country. The deserved ridicule which the press of the nation is heaping upon the amateurish deliverance of the Topeka Convention is worth nothing as an advertisment of our principles, because that deliverance does not embody our principles, being merely the opinion of certain Freethinkers about a subject concerning which organized Freethought can express no opinion, and hence cannot be defended. When those resolutions are thrown in our faces, we must either remain silent, awkwardly apologize for, or criticise and repudiate them. There was no warrant whatever for placing us in this most undesirable position.

So far the religious journals hav fought rather shy of moralistic observations on the great forest fire horror, but the Freeman's Journal (Catholic) ventures this:

"How helpless is man in the presence of the mighty elements of nature! How pitiable his condition were it not for God's ministering angel Charity, who hastens to his relief in the hour of distress and peril, and bids him take courage and hav faith in an eternal destiny and a merciful providence by whom his sufferings in this transitory life will not be forgotten!"

Certainly man is "helpless in the presence of the mighty elements of nature," but on the Theistic assumption this is equivalent to saying that he is helpless in the hands of God. God, according to that assumption, being unlimited in knowledge and power, it logically follows that he knew from eternity just how those poor people in Minnesota and Michigan would perish. But foreknowledge, in a being of infinit power, is equivalent to foreordination, and hence it also follows that God intended that the victims of the Northwestern fires should die exactly in the way that they did. There was no possible escape for them, no matter what they or others might hav attempted in the way of flight or rescue. Intelligent prevision, courage, decision, may and often do save men and women from premature destruction by the "elements of nature," but from an infinit God there is no possible escape; he has destined us to die in a certain manner, and when we do die, no matter how horrible a death, it is he who kills us, precisely as he had intended from the "beginning" to do. If Theism is true, a personal God choked or burned each and every one of those people who perished in the recent forest fires, as surely as though he had taken them in physical hands and strangled them or thrust them into their flaming houses and held them there until they were only lumps of charred flesh. All that the religious editor has to say about "God's ministering angel Charity," an "eternal destiny" of bliss in heaven (or of agony in hell), and a "merciful providence" is sickening to a degree—a horrible mockery of grief and torture. Quite possibly the man is sincere, but that fact does not make his deliverance any the less a ghastly burlesque on intelligence and morality. In passing it is pertinent to ask him upon what sound reasoning he bases the assumption that a god who does so poorly in this world will do so well in another? Is he to experience a "change of heart"? What warrant hav we in experience, common sense, or logic, to assume that the superlativly wise and good will do better in the future than he has done in the past?

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Chicago Secular Union re-opened Sunday, September 2d, with an excellent lecture by Samuel P. Putnam. September 9th Leon Lewis gave an able address on "Bruno." September 16th Mr. Putnam spoke again, On the 23d Mrs. M. A. Freeman lectures on "Science and Superstition." The speaker for the 30th has not been definitly decided upon, but possibly Mr. Putnam will again occupy the platform. It is hoped by these meetings to awaken Chicago Freethinkers to the necessity of united action and to secure a large attendance at the Congress. The lectures are free and the meetings are held at 181 Madison street every Sunday evening.

The enlightened white pietist can't afford to snigger too loftily at the religious darkness of the heathen Chinese at Hong Kong, who (so a cable says) tried to scare away the black plague by Joss processions accompanied with the letting off of crackers; nor need the Church of England folk think to oproudly of their Archbishop of Canterbury as compared to the viceroy of Canton, who publicly offered sacrifices to propitiate the devils. Orthodox creeds inculcate the very same superstition only it varies in its incidence. There are "prayers for rain" especially set out in the "Book of Common Prayer," approved of by Canterbury and indorsed by her Grashus, who is the head of the church! And isn't Australia familiar with "days of humiliation and prayer" as a cure for this evil, or for that—even to the sordid question of general bank-bursting? That book, too, contains a plague prayer or two and several other follies for use, when a ton of chloride of lime would be more to the point. It is the same superstition—the same principle of sacred ignorance; the difference is is only one of degree and incidence. Our bishops and parsons assemble and lead public tomfooleries; the Canton boss processes and offers sacrifices. Savages all.—Sydney Bulletin.

Ingersoll and His Critics.

From the New York World.

First. In the article written by me about suicide and published in the World, the ground was taken that "under many circumstances a man has the right to kill himself."

This has been attacked with great fury by clergymen, editors, and the writers of letters. These people contend that the right of self-destruction does not and cannot exist. They insist that life is the gift of God, and that he only has the right to end the days of men; that it is our duty to bear the sorrows that he sends with grateful patience. Some have denounced suicide as the worst of crimes —worse than the murder of another.

The first question, then, is:

Has a man under any circumstances the right to kill himself?

A man is being slowly devoured by a cancer, his agony is intense, his suffering all that nerves can feel. His life is slowly being taken. Is this the work of the good God? Did the compassionate God create the cancer so that it might feed on the quivering flesh of this victim?

This man, suffering agonies beyond the imagination to conceive, is of no use to himself. His life is but a succession of pangs. He is of no use to his wife, his children, his friends or society. Day after day he is rendered unconscious by drugs that numb the nerves and put the brain to sleep.

Has he the right to render himself unconscious? Is it proper for him to take refuge in sleep?

If there be a good God I cannot believe that he takes pleasure in the sufferings of men—that he gloats over the agonies of his children. If there be a good God, he will to the extent of his power lessen the evils of life.

So I insist that the man being eaten by the cancer—a burden to himself and others, useless in every way—has the right to end his pain and pass through happy sleep to dreamless rest.

But those who have answered me would say to this man: "It is your duty to be devoured. The good God wishes you to suffer. Your life is the gift of God. You hold it in trust, and you have no right to end it. The cancer is the creation of God, and it is your duty to furnish it with food."

Take another case. A man is on a burning ship, the crew and the rest of the passengers have escaped —gone in the life-boats—and he is left alone. In the wide horizon there is no sail, no sign of help. He cannot swim. If he leaps into the sea he drowns, if he remains on the ship he burns. In any event he can live but a few moments.

Those who have answered me, those who insist that under no circumstances a man has the right to take his life, would say to this man on the deck: "Remain where you are. It is the desire of your loving heavenly father that you be clothed in flame —that you slowly roast—that your eyes be scorched to blindness and that you die insane with pain. Your life is not your own, only the agony is yours."

I would say to this man: "Do as you wish. If you prefer drowning to burning, leap into the sea. Between inevitable evils you have the right of choice. You can help no one, not even God, by allowing yourself to be burned, and you can injure no one, not even God, by choosing the easier death."

Let us suppose another case:

A man has been captured by savages in Central Africa. He is about to be tortured to death. His captors are going to thrust splinters of pine into his flesh and then set them on fire. He watches them as they make the preparations. He knows what they are about to do and what he is about to suffer. There is no hope of rescue, of help. He has a vial of poison. He knows that he can take it and in one moment pass beyond their power, leaving to them only the dead body.

Is this man under obligation to keep his life because God gave it until the savages by torture take it? Are the savages the agents of the good God? Are they the servants of the infinite? Is it the duty of this man to allow them to wrap his quivering body in a garment of flame? Has he no right to defend himself? Is it the will of God that he die by torture? What would any man of ordinary intelligence do in a case like this? Is there room for discussion?

If the man took the poison, shortened his life a few moments, escaped the tortures of savages, is it possible that he would in another world be tortured forever by an infinite savage?

Suppose another case: In the good old days, when the Inquisition flourished, when men loved their enemies and murdered their friends, many frightful and ingenious ways were devised to touch the nerves of pain.

Those who loved God, who had been "born twice," would take a fellow man who had been convicted of heresy, lay him upon the floor of a dungeon, secure his arms and legs with chains, fasten him to the earth so that he could not move, put an iron vessel, the opening downward, on his stomach, place in the vessel several rats, then tie it securely to his body. Then these worshipers of God would wait until the rats, seeking food and liberty, would gnaw through the body of the victim.

Now, if a man about to be subjected to this torture had within his hand a dagger, would it excite the wrath of the "good God" if with one quick stroke he found the protection of death?

To this question there can be but one answer.

In the cases I have supposed it seems to me that each person would have the right to destroy himself. It does not seem possible that the man was under obligation to be devoured by cancer; to remain upon the ship and perish in flame; to throw away the poison and be tortured to death by savages; to drop the dagger and endure the "mercies" of the church.

If, in the cases I have supposed, men would have the right to take their lives, then I was right when I said that "under many circumstances a man has a right to kill himself."

Second. I denied that persons who killed themselves were physical cowards. They may lack moral courage; they may exaggerate their misfortunes, lose the sense of proportion, but the man who plunges the dagger in his heart, who sends the bullet through his brain, who leaps from some roof and dashes himself against the stones beneath, is not and connot be a physical coward.

The basis of cowardice is the fear of injury or the fear of death, and when that fear is not only gone, but in its place is the desire to die, no matter by what means, it is impossible that cowardice should exist. The suicide wants the very thing that a coward fears. He seeks the very thing that cowardice endeavors to escape.

So, the man, forced to a choice of evils, choosing the less, is not a coward, but a reasonable man.

It must be admitted that the suicide is honest with himself. He is to bear the injury, if it be one. Certainly there is no hypocrisy, and just as certainly there is no physical cowardice.

Is the man who takes morphine rather than be eaten to death by a cancer a coward?

Is the man who leaps into the sea rather than be burned a coward? Is the man that takes poison rather than be tortured to death by savages or Christians a coward?

Third. I also took the position that some suicides were sane; that they acted on their best judgment, and that they were in full possession of their minds.

Now, if, under some circumstances, a man has the right to take his life, and if, under such circumstances, he does take his life, then it cannot be said that he was insane.

Most of the persons who have tried to answer me have taken the ground that suicide is not only a crime, but some of them have said that it is the greatest of crimes. Now, if it be a crime, then the suicide must have been sane. So all persons who denounce the suicide as a criminal admit that he was sane. Under the law, an insane person is incapable of committing a crime. All the clergymen who have answered me, and who have passionately asserted that suicide is a crime, have by that assertion admitted that those who killed themselves were sane.

They agree with me, and not only admit but assert that "some who have committed suicide were sane and in the full possession of their minds."

It seems to me that these three propositions have been demonstrated to be true: First, that under some circumstances a man has the right to take his life; second, that the man who commits suicide is not a physical coward, and, third, that some who have committed suicide were at the time sane and in full possession of their minds.

Fourth. I insisted, and still insist, that suicide was and is the foundation of the Christian religion.

I still insist that if Christ were God he had the power to protect himself without injuring his assailants—that having that power it was his duty to use it, and that failing to use it he consented to his own death and was guilty of suicide.

To this the clergy answer that it was self-sacrifice for the redemption of man, that he made an atonement for the sins of believers. These ideas about redemption and atonement are born of a belief in the "fall of man," on account of the sins of our "first parents," and of the declaration that "without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin." The foundation has crumbled. No intelligent person now believes in the "fall of man"—that our first parents were perfect, and that their descendants grew worse and worse, at least until the coming of Christ.

Intelligent men now believe that the general course of the human race has been upward—that while some tribes and nations have gone backward and perished, others have advanced; that the world is nearer civilized to-day than ever before.

Intelligent men now believe that ages and ages before the dawn of history man was a poor, naked, cruel, ignorant, and degraded savage, whose language consisted of a few sounds of terror, of hatred and delight; that he devoured his fellow-man, having all the vices, but not all the virtues of the beasts; that the journey from the den to the home, the palace, has been long and painful, through many centuries of suffering, of cruelty and war; through many ages of discovery, invention, self-sacrifice, and thought.

Redemption and atonement are left without a fact on which to rest. The idea that an infinite God, creator of all worlds, came to this grain of sand, learned the trade of a carpenter, discussed with Pharisees and scribes, and allowed a few infuriated Hebrews to put him to death that he might atone for the sins of men and redeem a few believers from the consequences of his own wrath, can find no lodgment in a good and natural brain.

In no mythology can anything more monstrously unbelievable be found.

But if Christ were a man and attacked the religion of his time because it was cruel and absurd, if he endeavored to found a religion of kindness, of good deeds to take the place of heartlessness and ceremony, and if, rather than to deny what he believed to be right and true, he suffered death, then he was a noble man, a benefactor of his race. But if he were God there was no need of this. The Jews did not wish to kill God. If he had only made himself known all knees would have touched the ground. If he were God it required no heroism to die. He knew that what we call death is but the opening of the gates of eternal life. If he were God there was no self-sacrifice. He had no need to suffer pain. He could hav changed the crucifixion to a joy.

Even the editors of religious weeklies see that there is no escape from these conclusions—from these arguments; and so instead of attacking the arguments they attack the man who makes them.

Fifth. I denounced the law of New York that makes an attempt to commit suicide a crime.

It seems to me that one who has suffered so much that he passionately longs for death should be pitied instead of punished, helped rather than imprisoned.

A despairing woman who had vainly sought for leave to toil, a woman without home, without friends, without bread, with clasped hands, with tear-filled eyes, with broken words of prayer, in the darkness of night, leaps from the dock, hoping, longing for the tearless sleep of death. She is rescued by a kind, courageous man, handed over to the authorities, indicted, tried, convicted, clothed in a convict's garb, and locked in a felon's cell.

To me this law seems barbarous and absurd, a law that only savages would enforce.

Sixth. In this discussion a curious thing has happened. For several centuries the clergy have declared that while Infidelity is a very good thing to live by, it is a bad support, a wretched consolation, in the hour of death. They have, in spite of the truth, declared that all the great unbelievers died trembling with fear, asking God for mercy, surrounded by fiends, in the torments of despair. Think of the thousands and thousands of clergymen who have described the last agonies of Voltaire, who died as peacefully as a happy child smilingly passes from play to slumber; the final anguish of Hume, who fell into his last sleep as serenely as a river, running between green and shaded banks, reaches the sea; the despair of Thomas Paine, one of the bravest, one of the noblest men who met the night of death as untroubled as a star that meets the morning.

At the same time these ministers admitted that the average murderer could meet death on the scaffold with perfect serenity, and could smilingly ask the people who had gathered to see him killed to meet him in heaven.

But the honest man who had expressed his honest thoughts against the creed of the church in power could not die in peace. God would see to it that his last moments should be filled with the insanity of fear—that with his last breath he should utter the shriek of remorse, the cry for pardon.

This has all changed, and now the clergy, in their sermons answering me, declare that the Atheists, the Freethinkers, have no fear of death—that to avoid some little annoyance, a passing inconvenience, they gladly and cheerfully put out the light of life. It is now said that Infidels believe that death is the end—that it is a dreamless sleep—that it is without pain—that therefore they have no fear, care nothing for Gods, or heavens or hells, nothing for the threats of the pulpit, nothing for the day of judgment, and that when life becomes a burden they carelessly throw it down.

The Infidels are so afraid of death that they commit suicide.

This certainly is a great change, and I congratulate myself on having forced the clergy to contradict themselves.

Seventh. The clergy take the position that the Atheist, the unbeliver, has no standard of morality—that he can have no real conception of right and wrong. They are of the opinion that it is impossible for one to be moral or good unless he believes in some being far above himself.

In this connection we might ask how God can be moral or good unless he believes in some being superior to himself.

What is morality? It is the best thing to do under the circumstances. What is the best thing to do under the circumstances? That which will increase the sum of human happiness—or lessen it the least. Happiness in its highest, noblest form, is the only good; that which increases or preserves or creates happiness is moral—that which decreases it, or puts it in peril, is immoral.

It is not hard for an Atheist—for an unbeliever—to keep his hands out of the fire. He knows that burning his hands will not increase his well-being, and he is moral enough to keep them out of the flames.

So it may be said that each man acts according to his intelligence—so far as what he considers his own good is concerned. Sometimes he is swayed by passion, by prejudice, by ignorance—but when he is really intelligent, master of himself, he does what he believes is best for him. If he is intelligent enough he knows that what is really good for him is good for others—for all the world.

It is impossible for me to see why any belief in the supernatural is necessary to have a keen perception of right and wrong. Every man who has the capacity to suffer and enjoy, and has imagination enough to give the same capacity to others, has within himself the natural basis of all morality. The idea of morality was born here, in this world, of the experience, the intelligence of mankind. Morality is not of supernatural origin. It did not fall from the clouds, and it needs no belief in the supernatural, no supernatural promises or threats, no supernatural heavens or hells, to give it force and life. Subjects who are governed by the threats and promises of a king are merely slaves. They are not governed by the ideal, by noble views of right and wrong. They are obedient cowards, controlled by fear, or beggars governed by reward—by alms.

Right and wrong exist in the nature of things. Murder was just as criminal before as after the promulgation of the Ten Commandments.

Eighth. Many of the clergy, some editors, and some writers of letters who have answered me have said that suicide is the worst of crimes—that a man had better murder somebody else than himself. One clergyman gives as a reason for this statement that the suicide dies in an act of sin, and therefore he had better kill another person. Probably he would commit a less crime if he would murder his wife or mother.

I do not see that it is any worse to die than to live in sin. To say that it is not as wicked to murder another as yourself seems absurd. The man about to kill himself wishes to die. Why is it better for him to kill another man who wishes to live?

To my mind it seems clear that you had better injure yourself than another. Better be a spendthrift than a thief. Better throw away your own money than steal the money of another—better kill yourself if you wish to die than murder one whose life is full of joy.

The clergy tell us that God is everywhere, and that it is one of the greatest possible crimes to rush into his presence. It is wonderful how much they know about God and how little about their fellowmen. Wonderful the amount of their information about other worlds and how limited their knowledge is of this.

There may or may not be an infinite being. I neither affirm nor deny. I am honest enough to say that I do not know. I am candid enough to admit that the question is beyond the limitations of my mind. Yet I think I know as much on that subject as any human being knows or ever knew, and that is—nothing. I do not say that there is not another world, another life; neither do I say that there is. I say that I do not know. It seems to me that every sane and honest man must say the same. But if there be an infinitely good God and another world, then the infinitely good God will be just as good to us in that world as he is in this. If this infinitely good God loves his children in this world, he will love them in another. If he loves a man when he is alive, he will not hate him the instant he is dead.

If we are the children of an infinitely wise and powerful God, he knew exactly what we would do—the temptations that we could and could not withstand—knew exactly the effect that everything would have upon us, knew under what circumstances we would take our lives, and produced such circumstances himself. It is perfectly apparent that there are many people incapable by nature of bearing the burdens of life, incapable of preserving their mental poise in stress and strain of disaster, disease, and loss, and who by failure, by misfortune and want, are driven to despair and insanity, in whose darkened minds there comes, like a flash of lightning in the night, the thought of death, a thought so strong, so vivid, that all fear is lost, all ties broken, all duties, all obligations, all hopes forgotten, and naught remains except a fierce and wild desire to die. Thousands and thousands become moody, melancholy, brood upon loss of money, of position, of friends, until reason abdicates and frenzy takes possession of the soul. If there be an infinitely wise and powerful God, all this was known to him from the beginning, and he so created things, established relations, put in operation causes and effects, that all that has happened was the necessary result of his own acts.

Ninth. Nearly all who have tried to answer what I said have been exceedingly careful to misquote me, and then answer something that I never uttered. They have declared that I have advised people who were in trouble, somewhat annoyed, to kill themselves; that I have told men who had lost their money, who had failed in business, who were not in good health, to kill themselves at once, without taking into consideration any duty that they owed to wives, children, friends, or society.

No man has a right to leave his wife to fight the battle alone if he is able to help. No man has a right to desert his children if he can possibly be of use. As long as he can add to the comfort of those he loves, as long as he can stand between wife and misery, between child and want, as long as he can be of use, it is his duty to remain.

I believe in the cheerful view, in looking at the sunny side of things, in bearing with fortitude the evils of life, in struggling against adversity, in finding the fuel of laughter even in disaster, in having confidence in to-morrow, in finding the pearl of joy amid the flints and shards, and in changing by the alchemy of patience even evil things to good. I believe in the gospel of cheerfulness, of courage and good nature.

Of the future I have no fear. My fate is the fate of the world—of all that live. My anxieties are about this life, this world. About the phantoms called gods and their impossible hells, I have no care, no fear.

The existence of God I neither affirm nor deny. I wait. The immortality of the soul I neither affirm nor deny. I hope—hope for all of the children of men. I have never denied the existence of another world, nor the immortality of the soul. For many years I have said that the idea of immortality, that like a sea has ebbed and flowed in the human heart, with its countless waves of hope and fear beating against the shores and rocks of time and fate, was not born of any book, nor of any creed, nor of any religion. It was born of human affection, and it will continue to ebb and flow beneath the mists and clouds of doubt and darkness as long as love kisses the lips of death.

What I deny is the immortality of pain, the eternity of torture.

After all, the instinct of self-preservation is strong. People do not kill themselves on the advice of friends or enemies. All wish to be happy, to enjoy life; all wish for food and roof and raiment, for friends, and as long as life gives joy the idea of self-destruction never enters the human mind.

The oppressors, the tyrants, those who trample on the rights of others, the robbers of the poor, those who put wages below the living point, the ministers who make people insane by preaching the dogma of eternal pain; these are the men who drive the weak, the suffering, and the helpless down to death.

It will not do to say that "God" has appointed a time for each to die. Of this there is, and there can be, no evidence. There is no evidence that any god takes any interest in the affairs of men—that any sides with the right or helps the weak, protects the innocent or rescues the oppressed. Even the clergy admit that their God, through all ages, has allowed his friends, his worshipers, to be imprisoned, tortured, and murdered by his enemies. Such is the protection of God. Billions of prayers have been uttered; has one been answered? Who sends plague, pestilence, and famine? Who bids the earthquake devour and the volcano to overwhelm?

Tenth. Again, I say that it is wonderful to me that so many men, so many women, endure and carry their burdens to the natural end; that so many, in spite of "age, ache, and penury," guard with trembling hands the spark of life; that prisoners for life toil and suffer to the last; that the helpless wretches in poor-houses and asylums cling to life; that the exiles in Siberia, loaded with chains, scarred with the knout, live on; that the incurables, whose every breath is a pang, and for whom the future has only pain, should fear the merciful touch and clasp of death.

It is but a few steps at most from the cradle to the grave; a short journey. The suicide hastens, shortens the path, loses the afternoon, the twilight, the dusk of life's day; loses what he does not want, what he cannot bear. In the tempest of despair, in the blind fury of madness or in the calm of thought and choice, the beleaguered soul finds the serenity of death.

Let us leave the dead where nature leaves them. We know nothing of any realm that lies beyond the horizon of the known, beyond the end of life. Let us be honest with ourselves and others. Let us pity the suffering, the despairing, the men and women hunted and pursued by grief and shame, by misery and want, by chance and fate, until their only friend is death. R. G. INGERSOLL.

The Observer Afloat.

As my last week's account of a sea voyage on the schooner Summers of Noank, Conn., did not cover all the points of the excursion, I will now resume at or near the latitude where I interrupted myself. I neglected, however, to mention in the proper place that the government station at Sandy Hook, near the mouth of the outer New York harbor, has a foghorn that the administration ought to be ashamed of. To my agricultural ear it sounded so like the roaring of a bull pawing sand that I hinted to Captain Latham the prudence of keeping a little further out at sea. Perhaps he was right in stating that the bellowing was artificially produced, but I don't believe there is a farrow cow within ten miles of Sandy Hook.

But to resume, as agreed. The crew of the fishing smack are well fed. At 5 A.M. they hav coffee and cakes; at 8 a substantial breakfast; at 1 P.M. a still more substantial dinner, and at 5 or 6 an elaborate supper. Meals are served in the forecastle, the converging sides of which are occupied by bunks, the middle by the table, and the after part by the cook's utensils and supplies. We had steaks, roasts, fowl, fish, all sorts of vegetables that are worth eating, fruits, hot biscuits, pies, puddings, and duff. For drink, lemonade was the standby, but coffee, iced tea, and fresh water were available. Nearly all the crew use tobacco both ways, but no grog. It is a dry ship, for Captain Latham is a total abstainer; and he knows the weed only by its smell.

While waiting for wind or tide the men on the Summers hav plenty of leisure, which those who care to read can spend in the capacious cabin, where there is quite a library. It is, in fact, the ship's reading room. The captain never goes to sea without THE TRUTH SEEKER aboard, and he also has a collection of books published at the same office. He has a stateroom about six feet wide and containing two bunks, one of which is wide enough for a bridal berth. I occupied the latter. After reading, the next diversion of the seafarer is "yarning," at which he is almost as skillful as a member of the Grand Army of the Republic; and I infer that freshness or originality in the narrativ is no more requisit to secure the cordial attention and appreciation of his auditors than in the case of the soldier. If you interrupt the narrator with a thought suggested by his yarn, he at once accepts the amendment, and when he tells you the story again, which he is quite likely to do, you will find that he has not failed to utilize the ideas you had previously given him. A few years ago I spent six weeks in the woods with an uncle who had had many adventures on land and sea, in peace and war, and who was an able story-teller. Before I left him he knew all the incidents that I was able to relate, and had given them back to me as auxiliaries or riders to the accounts of his own experiences. I was a trifle hurt at first, but hav since reflected that the oral romancer must be accorded the same latitude as the writer of fiction. It is entertaining to me to see one of these yarners listening with deep interest while another repeats for the fortieth time a story with which he is perfectly familiar, and the termination of which he awaits philosophically, first, that he may supply any omission of the narrator, and secondly that he may himself turn orator and giv the other the forty-first edition of an equally familiar tale. Probably neither expects that his recital will be regarded as a statement of fact, but you will nevertheless incur his enmity and contempt if you cast doubt upon its truthfulness. He hasn't called you a liar, has he? No. Well, then, why should you question his veracity? Captain Latham is no yarner. His crew are the chroniclers of his achievements. He did, however, allude casually to the fact that last winter the Summers put out boats to rescue from the rigging the crew of a ship that had sunk almost to her maintop in a storm off Cape Hatteras, while the men at the government life-saving station looked on afraid to venture out until the fishermen set them an example they were ashamed not to follow. But the captain repeats this only as a sarcasm on official life-savers. He would hav landed the wrecked crew on his own deck twelve hours before if he had known of their distress.

The captain and crew of the Summers find a source of amusement in the attempts of other fishermen to catch porgies with a seine. When we reached Five Fathom Bank we found there present a rival outfit with a big schooner, numerous boats, a swearing crew and a net. They hadn't got a porgy for a week, and upon our arrival they took their apparatus aboard and set sail for New York. Before they were out of range of a marine glass, Captain Latham had set his net and made a haul of about eight or ten tons of porgies. It was then that the crew openly exonerated the observer from the suspicion of being a Jonah and he was created mascot by consent; for it was the biggest haul they had ever made, and the fish were of unusual size and magnificence.

Seining for porgies is a process which few landsmen hav opportunity to inspect, and perhaps a description of it would be useful. The sailorman Gus, whom I hav previously mentioned, holds the position of shot-heaver aboard the Summers. His function is to grind the menhaden into "stosh," which he shovels into a tub; the tub he places in the stern of a dory, and then rows a short distance from the vessel, and by throwing the "stosh" overboard, a handful at a time, gathers the fish about him. Meanwhile the captain and crew hav placed the seine, eight hundred feet long and one hundred feet deep, in two large skiffs, which are lashed together and rowed to where the fish are. When the word is given to let go, the skiffs suddenly separate and, powerfully propelled by sweeps, each describes a half circle with the shot-heaver's dory for a common center, the net being paid out over their inner rails. The top line of the net is floated by corks. The bottom is weighted after the fashion of the gowns which female converts wear at a baptizing. It also has a purse-line or puckering string at the same place, and when the skiffs hav completed the circle, this purse-line is hauled in and the net becomes a pocket. Both ends of the purse-line being passed through pulleys hung to a davit in the larger skiff, the crew begin to heave on it to raise the fish. The terms by which the men direct one another during this heaving process are as varied as the language of a colored person shooting craps. A Scandinavian named Peter, but called Ikey to distinguish him from the other Peters, had a fine assortment of these terms. While taking in the last few fathoms of the line he gave these directions. I jotted them down on the fly-leaf of Thoreau's "Walden," which I was reading:

Take in	Now
Once more	Bowse it up
All together	Heave then
And again	Bring it aboard
Pull in the line	Tighten the rope
Got to hav it	Let her come
Haul in	That's good

I hav not here reproduced the complete vocabulary, which if written in full would be as long as the list of prepositions, for Ikey's versatility, considering that he is a foreigner, is altogether remarkable. Having taken in and stowed all of the seine except a bight to hold the catch of fish, the contents are scooped, flopping and spattering, into a dory; or, if there are no sharks in it, nor bluefish, which are about as destructiv in proportion to their size, the net is towed directly to the vessel and the fish landed on deck at the first handling. Then, almost before the last kick is out of them, they are lowered into the hold and packed in compartments called ice houses.

I was not asked to go out in the boats and help set the seine, although I took no pains to conceal that I could pull an oar. The captain said he thought I could do the most good by staying aboard the vessel and praying. As he regards prayer as a useless agitation of the atmosphere, it is easy to see what value he placed upon my services. But I was not altogether idle. Kit, the cook, thinking that I must necessarily want to catch a fish, kindly baited a big hook, dropped it over the rail, and confided the line to my care. "Just hold it there, sah," said my colored friend. "Something take it directly, sah." Then he trimmed his stovepipe and disappeared below, while I entered upon the sport with an enthusiasm that nothing interfered with except the negligence of the fish in the matter of biting. I could see them skylarking around the bait, and making such plunges as a man sometimes executes with his head when overcome by mirth and obliged to snicker. The sport shortly became unfestiv. I imagined that all the men in all the boats angling on the Bank were watching me—that perhaps the cook down below had played a joke on me and was now grinning over it. To shorten the agony I began pulling in the line. Something resisted, so that I was filled with hope; but all I saw, as the line came aboard, was a great flopping thing, brown on one side and white on the other, and wide enough to cover a barrel, dangling from the hook. I dropped him on deck, white side up, and beheld the woefulest and solemnest countenance I had ever seen out of a Christian pulpit. I made haste to get one foot on his brow and the other on his tail, and he wept and gasped while I got red in the face trying to extricate the hook from his jaws. By the time I had succeeded in severing our connection I was totally disgusted with his society, and I expect he was with mine. I therefore picked him up on a shovel and hurled him violently back into the sea. The cook said it was a "skate," but when he went over the side he looked more like a kite.

We lay at anchor for two days, turning with the tide and rocking on the swell that goes over Five Fathom Bank. The major part of the time I sat upon a kind of thwart that runs along under the mainsheet traveler at the stern of the ship. I grew to like the windward portions of the deck best, for though no vessel was ever scrubbed oftener than the Summers, the fragrance of fish pervaded us. The cabin, especially while we were anchored, was occupied by a piscine smell of strong and athletic mold. Every fish in a natural state is coated with a substance that makes him slippery. While he reposes in the ice this dissolves and seeps through the deck of the hold into the bilge; and every time the ship lifts or dips her prow, so much of that accumulation as is not reached by the pumps goes charging backward or forward, leaving its odor of sanctity by the way. I could not make it out at first, and for some time looked with suspicion upon an innocent cuspidore by the stove and some sailors' socks hung on a line in the cabin. I likewise accused myself of smothering a nest of rats in my pillow or mattress. Once I asked the captain if the plumbing of his craft was in good order, but he only pointed over the bow and told me to go and inspect it. All my theories were inadequate; for incense like this arises only from the bilge-water of a fishing smack. If it were on the outside of the ship it would impede navigation, I think, owing to its thickness.

We got under weigh one evening just before supper, with some sixteen tons of fish on board and thirty-six hours to reach New York and catch the Wednesday's market, but the wind was dead ahead and our progress slow, while a heavy sea hove up out of the east. As a consequence we had more motion than speed; and all that night and the next day the sails and rigging flapped and thrashed about with the noise of musketry. It was pleasant enough, though, and the scene, while not startlingly varied, had its attractions nevertheless. The waves chased one another away, like little hills running a race. There was no land in sight and only once in awhile a sail. Set a splinter afloat in a tub—then rock the tub and imagin yourself aboard the splinter, and you will get a notion of our relations to the waters around us. Brother Byron was perhaps on a ship's deck, with the pathless sea ahead and the trackless sea behind, when it occurred to him to apostrophize the ocean as follows:

Roll on, thou deep and dark blue Ocean—roll!
Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain;
Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
Stops with the shore; upon the watery plain
The wrecks are all thy deed, nor doth remain
A shadow of man's ravage, save his own,
When, for a moment, like a drop of rain,
He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan,
Without a grave, unknelled, uncoffined, and unknown.

To sink into the depths in the manner indicated is the send-off that most sailors look forward to with more or less indifference. I made shift to giv our captain an abstract of Byron's remarks, and probably if he had been familiar with that author the old salt would hav replied in this strain:

And I hav loved thee, Ocean! and my joy
Of youthful sports was on thy breast to be Borne, like thy bubbles, onward; from a boy
I wantoned with thy breakers—they to me
Were a delight: and if the freshening sea
Made them a terror, 'twas a pleasing fear,
For I was as it were a child of thee,
And trusted to thy billows far and near,
And laid my hand upon thy mane—as I do here.

As all that I could recall of "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," in which the foregoing verses occur, was the stanza about the ungodly youth who ne in virtue's ways did take delight; and as the captain had neglected to memorize the lines of his part, there was no flow of poetry. He sat on the house darning his net where a shark had gnawed it, softly cussing his squaloid enemy meanwhile; forward, the cook trimmed his stovepipe and hung out his wash on the foreboom; from the forecastle came the sound of a Scandinavian sailor played upon by a mouth-organ; amidships the Portuguese hand sat on the break of the deck, smoking and mending his clothes; the man at the wheel kicked the spokes idly with his stockinged feet as he cast his eye from binnacle to leech and spat expertly over the lee rail; in the seclusion of the cabin below the first mate thumbed a marriage guide, anon turning his thoughts selfward to detect the presence of symptoms described.

Night falls! we hear the loud jib boom; the seaman takes his evening bight; then shrouded in the mist and gloom, amidst the shrouds he sets his light; and throwing overboard the match, of ocean song he trolls a snatch: of whip and sling he lays the slatch, in flemish coil upon the hatch; and when his evening swear is said, he winds with care his larboard watch, and seeks his little trunnel bed.

Night falls! the cook, whom thoughts of wrecks, and shifting winds distress and vex, like ebon ghost still haunts the decks, dank as they are with chill and dew, in dreams to trim his chimney-flue.

Night falls! 'tis quiet save the moan, and deep complaint and muffled tone, of one poor victim left alone, arising forward low and sad: it is that wild harmonicon, which plays the Scandinavian lad.

Night falls! and having wrapped the earth, she spreads her mantle out to sea, and curtains now the bridal berth that vibrates with the hum of me.

When night got up again and gave day a chance to assert itself, we were somewhere off Seabright, with a fair but feeble wind. Then a tugboat, for and in consideration of $15, to the captain thereof in hand paid, gave us a line and towed us into port. The voyage was ended and my dolce far niente, as it is proper to call a period of pleasant idleness, was disturbed. I never, in a week's time, grew so attached to place and people as I had become to the Gertrude Summers and her population, and, having lingered aboard as long as there was any excuse for doing so, I went ashore with some of the disconsolate feelings of a marooned mariner.

A Protest.

In the interest of Freethought organizations and future work I must protest against the absurd resolution of the Kansas State Freethinkers' Association* calling for the abdication of President Cleveland. The wording of the resolution is simply childish and frivolous. As a piece of rhetoric it is worthy only of a schoolboy's composition. It is beneath the dignity of a Freethought convention to indulge in such "hysterics." The idea of Freethinkers using the phrase, "we, the undersigned, do humbly beg, pray, and entreat." It makes me sick at heart to read such folly. Was there not one sound Freethinker in that convention to oppose such arrant nonsense? It is a shame that Freethought should be so misrepresented and become the laughing stock of the whole country. Think of it, that a Freethinkers' convention, in view of the important matters at issue, should make itself known to the country by foolishly asking Mr. Cleveland to "take off" his "crown," to "vacate" his "throne," to "lay down" his "scepter," and to "take" himself "away from human eyes forever." This is orthodoxy from the word go. There is no Liberalism and no Freethought in it, and common sense is indeed "conspicuous by its absence." I could imagin a Christian convention doing something of this sort, but a Freethought convention,

*According to the Chicago Times, the following message was sent to Grover Cleveland by the Kansas Freethinkers at their late convention: "We, citizens of Kansas and citizens of the United States, do hereby beg the privilege of presenting this earnest wish to your excellency Grover Cleveland, president of these United States: Inasmuch as there has been granted to every citizen of the United States the constitutional rights of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;' and, inasmuch as there has been granted by nature's laws the divine right of being well born; and, inasmuch as we see the rich armed against the poor, and the poor driven to selling their bodies and souls and man selling his manhood and woman her virtue for food and raiment, therefore we, the undersigned, do humbly beg, pray, and entreat, nay demand, that you take off your crown, vacate your throne, lay down your scepter, and take yourself away from the sight of human eyes forever."

never. It is bigotry pure and simple. In this case I do most woefully say, "Save me from my friends." This resolution will do more to injure our cause than anything the Christian churches can declare. For my part, I absolutely repudiate it as in any manner representing the true purpose of Freethought, and I am sure that both the national organizations will repudiate it as entirely contrary to their methods as expressed over and over again. However, I speak simply as an individual; but I believe I speak the sentiments of the best and most earnest supporters of Freethought throughout the country.

If the Kansas convention had denounced Cleveland for an official act which in itself was a violation of the Demands of Liberalism, it would hav been eminently proper, but to denounce him merely because he is the president of the United States, and ask him to "hide himself away from human eyes forever," is squarely contrary to all the principles of Freethought.

There are in our ranks and working with us, Freethinking Republicans, Freethinking Democrats, Freethinking Populists, and is a Freethought organization to insult the honest convictions of any of these men? I say, no, and a thousand times no. We are not to deal with partisan politics. Freethought organization has its special work. It deals with fundamental politics, with state secularization—and to this it confines itself, and this is its glory and its permanency—that it does deal with universal and all important principles, that it does that which no other organization can do; and it is only by attending to its legitimate business that Freethought can become a vast and splendid influence in this republic. I am pained beyond measure at these sad mistakes which are the result of wild and blind enthusiasm, and create discord and weakness in our ranks, and diminish incalculably our influence among the masses of the people. If one is interested in tariff or free trade, or silver, or single tax, there are plenty of organizations through which he can labor for these things. Why drag the Freethought organization out of its sphere to do that which other organizations can do better? If one is a Populist, let him work with the Populist party as a Populist, and work with the Freethought organization as a Freethinker, in conjunction with others of a different political faith as regards economic questions.

Freethinkers are deeply interested in all the great questions of the day—questions of industry, of education, of government, of reform; but they hav different opinions about these things. Freethinkers hav different opinions about Cleveland, about Harrison, about Henry George, about Bellamy, about Herbert Spencer, even about Skakspere. But a Freethought organization might just as well take sides in the Shakspere-Bacon controversy as in the silver and gold controversy, or free trade and tariff controversy. The Freethought organization has other work to do; and it must let these questions alone.

All Freethinkers are thoroughly agreed upon the Demands of Liberalism. These are the axioms of politics imbedded in the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of our country. It is for these principles—these transcendent principles of American politics—that we stand, and for noth ing else. We can stand for nothing else as a Freethought organization. These are the greatest principles, they are fundamental, and in their triumph is the triumph of a pure democracy and a true republic.

This is our work, and there can be nothing grander, more vast, or more beneficial. Let us keep our organizations to this one great domain. Here we shall keep our forces united. On this line we shall win the victory.

I want the Freethinkers of the country to understand distinctly the reason of my opposition to this unfortunate resolution of the Kansas Convention; why we cannot stand by it, that we must discard it. It takes us from fundamental principles to the bogs and quagmires of partisan politics; not only because it deals with an individual in a very foolish and ridiculous way, but because the matter of the resolution itself is beyond the province of the Demands of Liberalism. My contention is this, that the Freethought organization has a special purpose, namely, the total separation of church and state, and it should confine itself to this purpose. To go outside of this purpose is to weaken its organization and dissipate its forces. In fact, the Freethought organization will cease to be the moment it takes up outside issues. It will then be submerged in these outside issues. It will lose its reason for being. It will hav no speciality, no real individuality. It is by concentration—devotion to one great, supreme, universal principle—that Freethought organization will succeed. This is my line of work and I shall accept no other. I do not believe that the Freethinkers of Kansas will indorse a resolution so contrary both to ideal and practical Freethought. The spirit of the resolution is orthodox; its rhetoric is sophomorical, and its policy disastrous.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

News and Notes.

Leon Lewis gave an excellent lecture on "Bruno" before the Chicago Secular Union on Sunday evening, September 9th. It was a stormy evening, and only a few were present. Mr. Lewis has evidently given great care to this subject, and consulted original historical authorities, and he has given a quite accurate picture of this "First Martyr of Science," who has exercised such a profound influence upon Freethought in many directions, and who stands at the beginning of the new era of man. I hope this lecture will find a larger audience in the future.

The Sunday evening meetings of the Union will be maintained until the Congress in October. There are many difficulties connected with this work, but it will not be given up. If any Liberals are in the city from abroad, I hope they will make it a point to attend. The place of meeting is at 181 West Madison street, corner of Halstead street, third floor. It is important that we thus create an interest for future work.

I shall lecture next Sunday evening on "Evolution and Creation." Mrs. Freeman will lecture on September 23d on "Science and Superstition." On the first Sunday in October there will be a Trumbull Memorial meeting, at which addresses will be made by Clarence S. Darrow, S. P. Putnam, Mrs. Free man, and others. General Trumbull was always in the front rank of Freethinkers; and it is eminently fitting that his services should be thus remembered by his many comrades. His life was of heroic mold.

Notwithstanding the hard times, it is evident by the responses to our circulars and documents that we shall hav a large attendance at the Congress. Although we are in the pioneer ranks, there are many upon whom we can always depend for support, no matter what may be the outlook. I like to hav the voices of Liberals themselvs to show how earnestly they are enlisted in the movement, and are ready to help.

James H. Greenhill writes:

Of course I will be on hand in October, and will be glad to see you all, and will do what I can to make the Congress a success.

F. D. Rexford says;

I hope to attend the Congress. Was kept away last year by sickness. I shall be in Chicago, if possible, as I hav not been able to attend a Congress yet.

John A. Calder, of Tennessee, givs this word:

I want certainly to be with you at the Congress. I send my mite, and will try to make it more before you meet. I hope you will hav a good time.

Yours fraternally.

Our old comrade, O. Child, of Moline, Ill., truly says:

The great need, it seems to me. is organization. Superstition has her organizations. Every age and condition are gathered under the banners of the church. I hope to meet a few of the faithful at the Congress.

This word comes from Michigan:

I will do all I can in making the Congress as it ought to be—a grand success. I hope to meet you and many others at Chicago. I am yours fraternally,

P. B. REASONER.

And old Vermont is not behind:

BROTHER PUTNAM: I send you $5. I am too old to come, 88 years and 8 months. But you hav my best wishes.

JOHN D. POWERS.

And Massachusetts joins in:

I inclose $2. I cannot come; am 83 the 9th of October next. I am convinced that you are bound to succeed.

Yours always, JOHN WINN.

And California kindly remarks:

I do not doubt you need money for your Congress, and I inclose $10, with best wishes, and kind regards to my Liberal friends of Chicago. Yours truly,

MRS. P. VAN HOETER.

And Utah givs good cheer:

Although it would be one of the greatest pleasures of a lifetime to attend the coming Liberal Congress at Chicago, it will be impossible for us to do so. You will however find inclosed $1, which is our contribution.

Yours truly, GEO. and JOHANNA LARSON.

And Pennsylvania:

Please find inclosed $1 for the Congress. Sorry I can't be with you, but am confident you will do much good.

Yours, JOSEPH RHODY.

And Iowa:

Inclosed find $1 to help carry on the Freethought Congress. Hope it will be a success. Yours,

ABNER KIMBALL.

Again:

Replying to your circular letter, September 3d, I am pleased to inclose you herewith $10, being my contribution to the general fund. I hav been with you in thought and deed for many years, and wish you the best of success in your October Convention. and continued success throughout your life efforts. Yours very truly,

GEORGE STEPHENS.

Geo. L. Pratt, writes:

I am in full sympathy with the Freethought Federation and I inclose a small remittance to help carry out its objects and principles. I shall be glad to meet with the Congress.

Other responses:

I would gladly giv more if my pocket would permit. However, I will ever strive to giv a little when called on to assist the glorious cause. Yours fraternally,

E. E. WEST, M.D.

Dollars are scarce and hard to get; but we must all help your campaign a little. I am with you heart and hand and all I am able to do. Your truly,

M. H. COFFIN.

I herewith hand you $1. I wish I was able to lend more valuable aid to the cause.

Wishing you success as the exponent of a cause that merits the support of every human being. I am yours with kind regards. Sincerely, E. S. TODD.

E. C. REICHWALD, Dear Sir: The cause is a most worthy and noble one, and should be supported by all liberal-minded people. Of a little we giv a little, and would be pleased could we (myself and wife) do a thousand times more for mental emancipation.

Your friend, E. D. BLAKEMAN.

I inclose $1 in currency and am glad to know that the friends keep moving. Yours truly, STEPHEN BREWER.

B. F. Robbins writes:

I am proud of the persistent effort made by the stalwart workers in the cause of Freethought. I am doing some work in this vicinity with Freethought literature.

E. C. REICHWALD, Dear Sir: Yours of vesterday at hand. The principles of the Freethought Federation of America must be sustained or our government will fall. Inclosed is $5 for the Congress. Hoping that you may hav success in your good work,

Yours truly, THEO. HOLLY.

Herewith I hand yon draft for $25 in response to your call. I trust that you will hav the biggest kind of a Congress and a first rate time. Good luck to the cause.

Truly yours, N. F. GRISWOLD.

E. C. REICHWALD, Dear Sir: If I can find it possible to be at the Congress I will be there, or send a representativ to help swell the crowd. Our work must go forward with vim and vigor. In Cincinnati we are making accessions to the ranks and there is no cause for discouragement. Yours truly, I. H. COPPING.

S. F. Benson always sends good word:

I herewith inclose draft for $2; not much, but it will help the cause. I hope that Liberal friends will enjoy a rousing good Congress and kindle a fresh enthusiasm for the winter's work.

Our gallant captain from the South-west writes:

Dear Friend: I hav the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your circular letter, and in reply herewith inclose $3 for the National Freethought Congress with the regret that I am not able to participate, but I assure you you hav my warmest wishes for the success of the Congress. I remain very truly, your sincere friend.

CHARLES C. DE RUDIO.

I giv these extracts from a few of the many letters received in order to show the interest which exists all over the country for Freethought, which no words of mine can so well express. These extracts will keep up our courage, for like sparkling points they show that the flame of Freethought is still constant, and that there is a wide interest in the work, and that our National Congress will be well supported and well attended, and that we shall hav the means for future progress.

SAMUEL P. PUTMAM, President.

Freethought Federation—Treasurer's Report.

We hav sent out about three thousand documents in all, over the country—the Demands of Liberals, circulars, Constitution of the Federation, etc. The response so far is encouraging. Our endeavor is to stir up the Liberals and create a new interest in Freethought, and to hav a good Congress which shall enable us to do better work in the future. If each friend responds to our call with only twenty-five or fifty cents it will help us greatly. Do not fail to contribute, even if but little. Do your best, that is all. We shall appreciate the gift as if it were greater, for it represents good will and gain for our cause. Reports of contributions will be given every week in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A Time to "Chip In."

WESLEY, KAN., Aug, 30, 294.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find postal order for $1, to be used in defense of Mr. Wise of this state. This is a case in which I think every Freethinker ought to chip in, for we know not when our own turn will come. I hope every Freethinker will help a litttle. JOHN T. LAKIN.

Loves Good Books.

POINT PLEASANT, W. VA., Sept. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: If I had the time at the present moment, I would try to tell you of the high estimation in which your valuable journal is held by me. Suffice it for the present for me to say that I can't get along without it. It is my main mental pabulum and I cheerfully inclose $9.15 for paper and books, including "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Yours for Freethought and Intellectual Liberty,

JOHN R. SELBE.

Moving Slowly Upwards.

CHATHAM, N. Y., Aug. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I see by my tag I am in debt. Inclosed find $4; tag paper along one year and send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason." The world seems to be drifting our way. Too many inquirers prying into every nook and corner of things to be known, to run humbugs successfully. Eternal war of the positiv and negativ forces of the universe is essential to all life. Christians call it war between gods and devils. T. R. BURROWS.

Clearing Away Religious Debris.

SAGINAW, E. S., MICH., Aug. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order for 50 cents, for which please send me your edition of "Ghosts and Other Lectures" as advertised in your catalog. I talked with one of the book-sellers of this town and he told me that the church people combined to boycott any one who sold Infidel works. This is a sample of the tolerance and charity which Christianity has brought into the world. Hoping that you may be strengthened in your work of clearing away the religious debris which men call the church, I remain, Yours truly,

E. H. MCPHERSON.

Each to Judge for Himself.

GIBBON, NEB., Sept. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: By what authority does J. W. Richardson presume to say what my politics should be? Who gave him the moral standard whereby to measure the political convictions of all Freethinkers? What constitutes the "should" and the "ought" of a man's position upon questions of political economy? Such an expression as he gives forth in last week's TRUTH SEEKER has the genuin orthodox taint, and its offensivness is aggravated when he bases it upon principle. Let Mr. Richardson be a Republican with all liberty, but let him beware of displaying his paternal ipse dixits, or his snobbish "I am better than thou." C. PUTNAM.

For Adherence to First Principles.

IDAHO SPRINGS, COL., Aug. 31, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which please send one dollar's worth of the "Age of Reason" for missionary work among the heathen in this place, and apply the other for the defense of Mr. J. B. Wise, the victim of religious persecution, now awaiting trial in Kansas. I note with much satisfaction that the friends of truth are rallying to the support of this old man as well as to the support of the cause he has espoused. This is an opportunity for the spread of truth which should not be lost, and if the fight is conducted as I hav no doubt it will be, great good will result. On with the fight, and as you hav in the past proclaimed to the world that "the truth has made us free," we desire the freedom of all our priest-bound slaves to the end that our government may be restored to the first principles upon which it was founded, and which our enemies are trying to wrest from us by their appeals to the superstitions in which the masses hav so long been held captivs.

A Correction of a News Item.

MINDEN, NEB., Sept. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Seeing an item in the "News of the Week" column of THE TRUTH SEEKER saying that the Nebraska Populists selected their ticket from a list of names presented by the anti-administration Democrats, I wish to correct that error. The truth is, the Populists of this state select their candidates themselvs from their own ranks, and further, they are going to elect their whole ticket too without the aid of Democrats or Republicans. There are very few Democrats in this country and they are becoming fewer every day. To tell you the truth, Mr. Editor, neither you nor anybody else can distinguish any difference in this state between Republicans and Democrats; all the argument either of them presents is, "Anything to beat the d—d Populists." Now, it seems to me you try to make it appear at every opportunity that the Populists are an insignificant party, but you are away off if you think so.

Hoping to hear from you and also hoping to see this in the paper, I remain, Yours fraternally, D. S. NEWBOLD.

[Our correspondent is mistaken in thinking that we try to make it appear that the Populist or any other party is "insignificant." Our aim is to giv the news impartially, so far as we can giv it at all, and we hav to depend on the daily papers for our information. That is the source of the statement that the Nebraska Populists selected their candidates from a list of names presented by the anti-administration Democrats. It should be said in passing, however, that this did not mean a list of Democrats, but a list of Populists, any of whom would be acceptable to the anti-administration Democrats.—ED. T. S.]

Points Picked Up.

WALTZ, MICH., Sept. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just returned from a three weeks' vacation, spent in another county. With three unread TRUTH SEEKERS in my hands, I felt like a cat in a mouse nest—I didn't know which to grab first. As they are now fairly well disposed of, I thought I would giv you a few notes which I gathered on my trip.

For variety I attended church several times. One preacher, a Baptist, "gave himself away." In speaking of a certain reclaimed unbeliever, he said, "That man is now one of the best paying members of the church at that place." That was about the worst slip of the tongue I ever heard a preacher make, showing so clearly that he worked for revenue only.

A Free Methodist meeting was not without interest. One man had lately attended the funeral of his brother-in-law, who had surely gone plumb, because he was a Free Mason, after being warned of its awful sinfulness. Several men bragged about their wickedness before conversion. One got excited, and in trying to tell of the spirit which used to dwell within him, his tongue turned the thing around, and made him say, "Why, brethren, I hav sometimes had a woodchuck in me as big as the devil."

A friend told me of an incident in which his brother was concerned. In driving home one day he got out of his wagon to pick up a horse-shoe. His team began to run. He, by running also, got hold of the back end of the wagon-box. In getting in he bruised his knee very severely on the end board. It caused considerable pain, and by the time he reached home he was in a fighting mood. A neighbor had stopped at the gate, who now demanded two bushels of wheat for the preacher. The injured man raised his hand and yelled, "Two bushels of hell! No damned preacher will get a kernel of wheat from me." This so scared the mendicant friar that he hurried off and told the people that Perry had gone dangerously crazy. "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." FRANK E. ROMINE.

Questions Asked and Answered.

ESKRIDGE, KAN., Aug. 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Not long ago Professor ——, and a certain school teacher, came to my place of business, and wanted to know why I was an Agnostic, and why I took such positiv grounds against the infallibility of the Bible and the Christian religion, in view of the fact that I might be mistaken, that we did not know anything positivly, to which I replied: "Your statements devour themselvs. If, as you say, 'We do not know anything positivly,' why do you assail my motiv? You hav admitted that you do not know that my position is wrong, and that you are not positiv as to the inspiration of the Bible, or infallibility of the Christian religion. It seems to me you are denying too much. The true Agnostic does not claim to know all; he admits that it is but little he knows compared with what there is to know, but that we are finding out more every day; that we are positiv about some things." They both insisted that we did not know anything for certain. I said: "If you put your finger in the fire it will burn, and you know it." "Well," said the teacher, "if you place your finger on an extremely cold iron a similar sensation will be produced." I answered: "You are begging the question. I insisted that you know that your finger will burn if you place it in the fire, and it might be proper for me to ask how you know that a similar sensation is produced by placing the finger on a cold iron; you just said you did not know anything positivly." I added that, for the sake of argument, we would admit the similarity of sensation, still there would be a difference both as to phenomena and effect. I asked, "Do you know the multiplication table?" Both laughed and said they supposed so. I asked several questions, which were answered affirmativly. Professor —— then wanted to know my opinion of the Bible. I made several quotations, and expressed my opinions quite freely. He wanted to know if I thought that Moses wrote the first five books of the Old Testament—to which I replied: "It seems to me that you hav not read the Old Testament carefully." He admitted that he had not. I wish that all might read it carefully.

Kept Awake by Nothing.

ST. CHARLES, MINN., Sept. 1, 294.

MR. EDITOR: As I write I can hear the preacher in a church not very far away talking to his people or to his God—I do not know which—but I think his people or his God must be very hard of hearing, judging from the noise he makes.

There are six churches in this little town, and the women and children seem to attend regularly, but the men do not appear so devout. I attended one where there were but two men besides myself.

We hav also a sprinkling of Freethinkers, many of whom will attend church occasionally, but the Christians will not attend our lectures worth a cent. They are to be pitied. I pity anyone who cannot or will not look on both sides of a question, or will not investigate. But the world is progressing in spite of all the obstacles thrown in the way by over-zealous Christians. The fact is, people are becoming more and more civilized every day. You can now find quite civil people among all classes. Even Christianity is making progress in this direction. And when Christianity is making a little advance the world is making great strides.

Mrs. M. P. Krekel was lately here and gave us three splendid lectures. The subject the first night was, "Principles and Objects of Secularism," in which she showed plainly that there is no savior but human effort, and no providence but science, and that the criterion of right and wrong is the welfare of the human family. She affirmed that all progress is secular, not Christian, and that the ground or foundation of right and wrong is in human nature, not outside.

The second evening's subject was "Christian Civilization, or Civil Christianity—Which?" in which she showed that secular knowledge is the groundwork of all civilization. The accomplishment of civil liberty, or man's right, was by man's effort and man's alone, not by a divine ruler. The foundation of our government, the establishment of our free schools, the emancipation of the slaves, were all due to secular effort. Also the emancipation of woman is due to the same cause.

The third lecture was "The Lessons Learned From the Congress of Religions at Chicago Last Year." She showed that it was the principles of Secularism that paved the way or made it possible for the advocates of the different religions to come together in harmony and compare notes or the principles of one religion with those of others. Also the principles of Secularism or secular knowledge made the great World's Fair at Chicago, where people from all quarters of the globe, artisans, mechanics, sculptors, painters—all trades and professions—met and showed to the world the progress and improvement in each and all of them.

To appreciate her lectures one must hear them delivered. She uses the choicest language, is gentle but firm and convincing, holding her audience spellbound and thrilling them through and through with her presence and eloquence. I wish she could be employed all the time. What an amount of good would thereby be accomplished! All here who could appreciate or understand her language speak in glowing terms of her. One man, however, said when I asked him to come to the last lecture that he did not want to hear any more of it; that he did not sleep a wink all night after hearing the first lecture, and there was nothing to it, no foundation. It seems, however, it kept him awake. I told him Christianity had a good solid foundation—being founded on a dream. Yours for humanity,

B. PEABODY.

Lincoln's Religious Views.

OMAHA, NEB, Sept. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: A short time ago I contributed an article to the daily World-Herald of this city on Lincoln's religion, claiming that Lincoln was not a Christian. The article contained a personal letter from Wm. H. Herndon, for twenty years Lincoln's law partner, stating that Lincoln was an Infidel, and it provoked the wrath of a bigoted Methodist preacher of this city, who had published a reply to the article a few days ago, which reply was full of irrelevant statements and quotations, pious fictions and the usual supply of abuse—the stock in trade of orthodox ministers.

The World-Herald refused to publish my rejoinder to the reverend gentleman's article, and I inclose the same, hoping you will giv it a place in your paper.

FRANKLIN J. GRIFFEN.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

OMAHA, NEB., Sept 3, 1894.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE World-Herald: A certain local Methodist minister in a recent issue of your newspaper attempts to defend Lincoln's Christian faith, and claims that in later life Lincoln was a believer in Christianity and not an Infidel. It is admitted by the reverend that in early life Lincoln was an unbeliever. History proves that it was then that he won the soubriquet of "Honest Abe." Lincoln's "own unimpeached utterances" do not by any means prove that in later life he became a Christian.

While at Washington in 1862 (in the "veal" period?) in answer to inquiries concerning his religion and the expressed hope that he had become a Christian, Lincoln wrote as follows to his old friend, Judge Wakefield: "My earlier views of the unsoundness of the Christian scheme of salvation and the human origin of the scriptures hav become clearer and stronger with advancing years, and I see no reason for thinking I shall ever change them." (Remsburg's "Lincoln.")

This is a statement of disbelief in the Bible as a "perfect moral code given to man by infinit wisdom," and in Jesus as "the Savior," in the Christian sense.

The letter written by Lincoln to his dying father, containing a statement of belief in the immortality of the soul, proves nothing relevant to the issue. Two of the greatest Infidels who ever lived, Voltaire and Paine, believed in immortality. Thomas Paine believed not only in happiness for the good after death, but in punishment for the wicked. (Paine's works, p. 280.)

Concerning Lincoln's views on the efficacy of prayer, Mrs. Lincoln stated shortly after his death that the following was a favorit maxim with him: "What is to be will be, and no prayers of ours can arrest the decree." (Lamon's "Lincoln.")

Even if Lincoln did believe in prayer it neither proves his Christianity nor disproves his Infidelity. Jews pray, Mohammedans pray, some Deistic Infidels pray.

Regarding providence: In a speech on Kansas in 1856 (in the "veal" period?) Lincoln said: "Friends, I agree with you in providence, but I believe in the providence of the most men, the largest purse, and the longest cannon."

"No clearer statement of the Christian doctrin of a divine providence has ever been made."

That Lincoln believed in a God is irrelevant to the issue. Jews, Mohammedans, and Deistic Infidels believe in a God. Voltaire and Paine were believers in God.

In the latter years of his life (in the "veal" period?), when the subject of religion was mentioned, with a knowing smile, Lincoln was wont to remark: "It will not do to investigate the subject of religion too closely, as it is apt to lead to Infidelity." (Manford's Magazine.)

To lend an air of plausibility to their claims, the clergy and other Christian claimants often cite expressions of a seemingly semi-pious nature to be met with in Lincoln's speeches and state papers. These hav been partially accounted for by Herndon and Lamon, and are still further explained by one of Lincoln's "own unimpeached utterances." In his "Reminiscences of Lincoln," Judge James M. Nelson, who was intimately acquainted with him in Washington (in the "veal" period?) says: "I asked him once about his fervent Thanksgiving Proclamation, and twitted him with being an unbeliever in what was published. 'Oh,' said he, 'that is some of Seward's nonsense, and it pleases the fools.'" It is hardly possible that Lincoln would hav said this if he had been a "reverent and devout Christian."

During the war (in the "veal" period?) Lincoln's attention was called to the notoriously bad character of army chaplains. He expressed his contempt for them and for orthodox preachers in general by relating the following story:

"Once, in Springfield, I was going off on a short journey, and reached the depot a little ahead of time. Leaning against the fence just outside the depot was a little darkey boy, whom I knew, named Dick, busily digging with his toe in a mud puddle. As I came up, I said, 'Dick, what are you about?' 'Making a church,' said he. 'A church.' said I. 'What do you mean?' 'Why, yes,' said Dick, pointing with his toe. 'Don't you see? There is the shape of it. There's the steps and front door—here's the pews, where the folks set—and there's the pulpit.' 'Yes, I see,' said I, 'but why don't you make a minister?' 'Laws,' answered Dick,' with a grin, 'I hain't got mud enough.'" ("Anecdotes of Lincoln," p. 86.)

Enough has been presented to show that Lincoln was, "as a mature man," a disbeliever in the popular superstition—Christianity.

The biographies of Gibbon, one of the greatest of historians, Darwin, the greatest of naturalists, and other great men I might mention, show that orthodox Christianity is very often for the "veal" period. Both Gibbon and Darwin were in early life orthodox Christians, "but, like other natural men of vigorous intellect and activ conscience," they, "outgrew the 'veal' period," and became later in life disbelievers in Christianity. That brilliant, talented woman, Helen H. Gardener, has truly said: "The cradle has fallen heir to the discarded dogmas of the pew."

It is fortunate, in view of the misleading statements rehashed by your reverend correspondent, that Lincoln's memory needs no defense except by his own "unimpeached utterances."

FRANKLIN J. GRIFFEN.

Sees a Serpent at the Polls.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Sept. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading the different articles commenting on Mr. Sandberg's letter, and at last, with your permission, I will reply to one and all, and giv some of my reasons for objecting to women voting. I am a woman and long to be recognized as man's equal. I want to help make the laws that govern me. Before me I see the opportunity of gaining my desires, but right at the polls is a serpent ready to crush me in its deadly coils; that serpent is religion. I am willing to remain minus my right to vote yet a little longer to escape a greater evil.

First you must admit that women as a class are the slaves and dupes of fashion and religion. A walk or drive through any town or city of a Sunday will convince the most prejudiced mind of the truth of my assertion. See the frail young girl just budding into womanhood, her face disfigured with powder, laced so she can scarcely breathe, shoes a size too small, and clothing so tight that the blood cannot circulate; her system is wrecked, her natural form disfigured, and her brain could not digest a common-sense lecture to save her life. Reason with her; point out the awful harm she is doing herself. It is like pouring water on a duck's back. It has no effect, she would die to be fashionable (and she is to be the mother of our future generations). She is fairly educated, is well read in dog-eared novels and trashy literature from the church libraries (or goody goody sermons by some pulpit poodle), which ruins the memory, and oh, so often the girl herself. Her only desire is to find some fashion fool who dresses in the latest style and can furnish ice-cream and will spend his last nickel, if necessary, to take her to theaters, dances, and driving. Outside of dress, dancing, novels, gossip, and church, her mind is blank. I hav tried for months in the past to get woman to converse on sensible topics, to draw out her soul and set her to thinking, but it was in vain. I became disgusted and heartsick at the utter lack of soul in women as a class. If I talked about her neighbors, the new preacher, a ball, pugs, or poodles, some young man with more money than brains, or her beauty, I had her attention; but if I changed the subject to politics, science, health, or any of the live issues of the day that interest people of intelligence and soul, she knew nothing, did not want to learn, had no desire to listen, and her eyes, if not her lips, expressed her disgust at such dry, stuffy conversation.

She goes to church, prayer-meeting, and Sunday-school, and can tell you just lots about it, to show her devotion to her God. She could not tell you the text to save her life, nor repeat over one verse of the Sabbath-school lesson; but she could tell you how elegantly the oily-tongued minister was dressed, and what a lovely voice he had; how many fine-looking young dudes she saw in Sunday-school, and the exact shade of her classmates' ribbons and dresses. Her Bible will lie dusty and unused on the parlor table, but you dare to tell her it is not a holy book, and she will look daggers at you. It is strange, but true, she will not examin the contents and find the nasty, filthy passages it contains. She is positiv this book is the guide to heaven, yet she does not read it. It is like science, etc., too dry to interest her, but she knows positivly that there is a heaven and a hell because the minister tells her so (he gets it from the dear old holy Bible), and she dare not question him. She opens her mouth, closes her eyes, and swallows the dose he givs without a murmur. She knows we poor Infidels are doomed to hell, and if looks could kill, we would be sent there promptly. Christian charity defined compels them to believe as we do, or send them to a warmer climate. Again, they are fast in the clutches of the church; they toil like slaves to support a lot of preachers and priests too indolent to work, and just mean and little enough to allow women to support them; they take servants' places at festivals, oyster suppers, etc., to aid the missionary cause (while America's poor are reared in vice and ignorance). They sew and cook and stew, to help the temperance society (while their own children are too often tripped up at the saloon door through a mother's neglect). They tax their brains and wear themselvs out begging money to pay church debts (and too often their own homes are sold for unpaid debts). They sell kisses, keep fish-ponds, guess bean pots, etc., to build new churches, while their own children lack care and attendance. Men and women will listen to a sermon, nine-tenths of the men will disagree with the minister, while nine-tenths of the women will agree with him and use every effort in their power to bring about the things preached.

Oh, how often I hav passed the door of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, heard their prayers to down the whisky traffic, and walked perhaps one square farther to see some of these women's children on the street, thrown in contact with companions who would entice them into the saloons. While these women wrestle with a deaf God, their children become the wine-bibbers of the future. If mothers would only depend on their own powers in place of a God they know nothing about we would hav less intemperance.

Mrs. Kuffel refers to a school teacher, remarking, "We would down the whisky traffic and hav a Sunday law in California." Do you know what downing the whisky traffic through the Women's Christian Temperance Union means? Are you acquainted with their platform? Below is a scrap of its intentions and the sentiments of its world-famed and bigoted president, Francis E. Willard. "The Women's Christian Temperance Union, local, state, national, world-wide, has one vital, organic thought, one absorbing purpose, one undying enthusiasm; it is that Christ shall be this world's king, king of its courts, its camps, and its commerce; king of its colleges and its cloisters; king of its customs and its constitutions. . . . Concerning the platform of our next national prohibition convention, I am content to leave it substantially as it is, save that it should declare Christ and his law to be the basis of government and the supreme authority in national as in individual life." Now, Mrs. Kuffel may be willing to help enthrone Christ as king, to bring women down to the level of the brute (where the dear apostle Paul commands them to stay or be forever damned); I am not. I despise intoxicating drinks as a beverage, but my temperance begins at home. My child shall be taught the use and abuse of liquors, and will never be tripped up at the saloon door through my neglect. I want to see liquor abolished (as a beverage), but never through the vote of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Mrs. Kuffel and Laura Knox boldly assert that women will vote as intelligently as men with such a platform. We all know the vast numbers and power of the Women's Christian Temperance Union in the United States. Where would our beloved Federation be, and the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, as well as all other movements of reform? If woman had the ballot Talmage would be president; God in the constitution; our grand and glorious republic ruined, and the present Constitution trampled in the dust. Liberals would be ostracized from our country (for we are hated far more bitterly, as a class, by women than by men), or compelled to go to church. I would rather make my home among the Feejee islanders than bow and cringe to the preachers and churches, and would prefer the life of an exile to being a hypocrit and taking such a nasty book as the Bible for my guide. Bah! I prefer dog-eared novels to such trash. Giv me literature of intelligence and sense, but good-bye to such literature if women vote now. "The idea of the writer calling himself Liberal when he is trying to prohibit people from making Sunday laws." Can I be Liberal and allow my own liberty abridged? Must I, to be a Liberal, allow a man to cut my head off if he makes the attempt? I presume, if I prevented him, I would not be Liberal. Are my own rights to hav no consideration? Am I Liberal when I allow these dear Christian friends to trample on the Constitution of the United States; to ruin my country and my home, and take from my friends and myself all natural rights without raising my voice in defense of freedom? By what right do they wreck my home and our government, and set up a man-made God to rule and reign over me? By what authority do they make a law to compel me to support their superstition factories, to observe a day in psalm singing and idleness, to honor an imaginary being in the skies? Why should they compel me to be ruled by a religion I despise? It is an insult to honest people, and unjust canters who command it, and if, by raising my voice against it I forfeit the name Liberal, then I am no Liberal. Let them make their Sunday laws among themselvs; let them hav their churches and Bibles, but when they try to pull me down to their level I protest. I would rather be branded as a traitor by this class of people than to sink to that depth of ignorance and superstition again. No, friends, women are not prepared to cast their vote for the best interest of their country, they are the foes of liberty and intelligence; they do not mean to be, but they are just the same. I believe they are working faithfully and sincerely for what they think is right, but that is no reason why we should allow them the liberty of doing still more harm. As long as they are willing to limit their narrow little world to dress, pug dogs, churches, novels, and the flattery of the opposit sex, they are no fit subject to hav the ballot, and as long as they submit to being a slave and tool for man, they deserve their present position. Now they are led around (by a string in the nose) by their minister, and would obey implicitly the commands of that jumping-jack at the ballot-box.

They cry for temperance, but refuse to be temperate themselvs; they still cling to the customs of the dark ages in dress while man has long since discarded such frivolity; they plead for freedom in politics while their bodies are imprisoned, laced, tortured; they ask for equality of sex, but refuse to become man's equal intellectually. I am sorry to write thus about my sex (my heart aches for them), but it is true. Mr. Sandberg has given plain facts. I am not too prejudiced to admit it because he is a man. I want equality of sex. I hav many mouth battles for my sex, but I cannot remain deaf and blind to their faults because they are women. I know that men as a class are prejudiced against equality of sex, but that does not fit women to vote. The ignorant foreigner and negro are given the ballot while women are still fettered. Yes, women could vote more intelligently than this class—many women more intelligently than the majority of men. It is humiliating to be governed by this clsss, for they do help make laws for us poor women; but it is the religious platform that makes the trouble. Men are pretty well balanced in religious sentiments, but nine-tenths of the women are in a body for the church. We hav too much ignorance and religion in the voting class now. It is better to hav a general cleaning up in place of adding more fuel to the already smoldering fire. Why make it stronger? I detest the present voting system. Giv intelligent men the ballot; then extend it to intelligent women. Every man and woman voter should understand the platforms of the different parties and the Constitution of the United States and be able to read and write them correctly before allowing them the right of franchise. Now, ladies, when will you learn to be fair and view both sides of the question? Stop fighting for woman suffrage; use your efforts to crush out the ignorant voters in the opposit sex; use your influence in your home to root out the rum holes. Keep your money from heathen lands and educate America's poor. Build fewer churches and more homes and schools for the destitute, and your own vote will be your reward for the intelligence you inculcate in others.

Laura Knox must know that there are advanced men and women of the present who do not favor women voting for the same reasons I hav given. I hav asked no less than twenty-five Liberal women in San José, Capitola, and various places, their opinions on the subject, and the answer has been unanimously that they are not prepared to vote. Two gentlemen favored woman suffrage; one remarked, "Let them vote and run the country to [a hot climate]; it will be a good eye-opener for them." I do not think so; at least it is too risky to try. Laura may change her mind if she investigates thoroughly. I believed as she does, but investigation taught me better.

I am speaking of women as a classs. There are brave, noble, progressiv women, but oh, how few in comparison to the many others. Now, men are full of faults too, but my letter is already too long to bring them before you.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Tasseled Corn.

I sing thy glory, swaying corn,
Thy charms that never fail;
The wayside fields that you adorn
Are more than holy grail.

Moist and sweet your odors are
Upon the twilight fair;
Your blossoms send, anear and far,
A promis rich and rare.

Your banners, rustling in the air,
Murmur a soothing song;
Your gold and garnet tassels there
With tender fancies throng,

Your golden grain more precious is
Than India's famous wealth;
Pale lips are touched by its sweet kiss
To rose-hued, happy health.

For strength and grace and charming mien,
Symmetrical and free,
The sculptor might, with vision keen,
In thee a model see.

So bright and true, your gracious worth,
In every changing phase,
Shall float abroad o'er all the earth,
O golden, glorious maize.

The Walnuts.

The straight, green path lengthened out under the overhanging branches of the trees, which stood on either side, and terminated in a yellow field where the ripe wheat glistened in the sunshine. Here and there, the sun, piercing the thick foliage, formed little islands of light on the turf, which moved fantastically about as a soft wind fitfully swayed the tops of the trees.

Two persons, a man and a woman, with slow steps were walking down the path, she supporting herself with her parasol in lieu of a cane; he upright and smart, his hands behind his back; her hair covered with a veil of rich lace under which her silver curls were plainly visible; he with a broad-brimmed straw hat on his gray head. They were evidently annoyed with each other, for they walked on without speaking and without an exchange of glances, save now and then to cast a furtiv look of reproach at each other. At last, when they had traversed half the walk, she said to him in a voice which, though sweet, still shook slightly as if there remained a little anger in it:

"It is decided then; you are going to make those children unhappy?"

"On the contrary, I shall arrange that my granddaughter will never reproach me with having caused her unhappiness by permitting this imprudence."

She shrugged her shoulders, but very slightly, however, as was becoming a woman of good breeding.

"Because the boy, who loves her, is not quite so rich as she—— How fine that is! They are always sure of having bread at least——"

"But not butter, perhaps!" observed the grandfather.

"When one is in love he can eat kisses on his bread," she responded, with a little laugh.

As he did not answer this she walked on a few steps, looking to the right and to the left, then stopped before a walnut tree.

"Look, my dear," said she, "are there not some nuts there?"

With chivalric politeness the grandfather approached, and, looking through his glasses, regarded the tree and replied:

"Yes, there are some nuts there."

"Will you get me a few, my dear?"

The grandfather looked at the grandmother with some surprise. It had been many years since either had found any pleasure in eating nuts. Nevertheless he pulled down a branch within reach of his wife, and she broke off a little twig of nuts, as yet hardly ripe, and pinned it on her bosom.

"Do you not remember?" said she.

A ray of sunshine, breaking through the leaves, lighted up the old man's face—or was it a ray of memory? The gray eyes of his wife penetrated into his with a disquieting persistence. He remembered very well; but what had these walnuts to do in such a serious affair as his only granddaughter's marriage? He pretended to be occupied with a tree whose branches needed the attention of the pruner; but his wife went on:

"It is that very tree" (for it was an old walnut tree) "which had so many nuts the year that——"

"I know, I know," said he.

"I was here," she continued, "and I had just gathered the nuts on the lowest branches, when you came. It was you who helped me to finish filling my basket, and, as the pile of burs grew higher and higher, your eyes became more and more talkativ; and it was you, I think, who put the last twig of nuts where I hav pinned this one."

"My dear wife!" said the old man.

"And you said to me, 'Madeline, if your parents will not consent to our marriage, I shall be wild'——"

"And we were married and we hav been happy together many years," concluded the grandfather.

"And we were not rich, we hav become that—the children will do so—do you remember?"

They said no more, but they walked slowly on, arm in arm, until they reached the end of the lane. There they paused, and he said at last:

"Well they must wait a little longer, so that we can help them more than we are able to do just now."

"Very well," she said, "they are young yet and their hearts are warm."

"You see, I must let them hav enough to get some butter."

"And while they are young," said the grandmother, "I shall see that they always hav enough walnuts."—Selected.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Price, 20 cents, six for $1.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

Gems of Thought.

TEMPTATION is the file which rubs off much of the rust of self-confidence.—Fenelon.

He who is most slow in making a promis is the most faithful in its performance.—Rousseau.

FOR virtue's self may too much zeal be bad; the worst of madness is a saint run mad.—Pope.

THE vanity of loving fine clothes and new fashions, and valuing ourselvs by them, is one of the most childish pieces of folly that can be.—Sir M. Hale.

WE think our civilization near its meridian, but we are yet only at the cock-crowing and the morning star. In our barbarous society the influence of character is in its infancy. As a political power, as the rightful lord which is to tumble all rulers from theirs, its presence is hardly yet suspected.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

IT is reported that a lunatic appeared at the White House and demanded that it be turned over to the Jews. The police disposed of him expeditiously. The cranks in the Senate and House of Representativs, however, who demand that the entire country be turned over to a section of the Christians, are still at large.—American Israelite.

THE requirements of equity must be supplemented by the promptings of kindness · · · The primary law of a harmonious social coöperation may not be broken for the fulfilment of the secondary law; and therefore, while enforcement of justice must be a public function, the exercise of beneficence must be a private function.—Herbert Spencer.

IT is a pretty generally received doctrin among modern sociologists that what is known as the public conscience, the standard of right and wrong in any given society, is an evolution, the resultant of innumerable experiences, from which evolved man concludes that on the whole he is happier if he does right than if he does wrong.—New York Times.

MY hope for the human race is bright as the morning star, for a glory is coming to man such as the most inspired tongue of prophets and of poets has never been able to describe. The gate of human opportunity is turning on its hinges, and the light is breaking through its chink; possibilities are opening, and human nature is pushing forward towards them.—Emerson.

MERELY ethical or theological appeals to good motivs, if they are not actually a bar against, only inappreciably aid in progress toward the straightening out of social difficulties. What we need are men who see and discuss radical principles. There is the most definit and exacting application necessary. I find that scholars apologize and supplicate where they should assert and defy.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE superiority of our time over antiquity is due not to the greater purity of our religion, or excellence of our poetry, or wisdom of our philosophers, but mainly to the possession of machinery and improved tools, which hav facilitated and saved labor, enabled men to liv with more comfort and security, given them leisure, opportunity, and motiv to educate themselvs, and thus carried them to higher intellectual and moral conditions, and also secured them against conquest by barbaric foes.—John S. Hittell.

WHY, then, eternal punishment for the temporary offenses of so frail a creature as man? · · · Heaven and hell suppose two distinct species of men—the good and the bad; but the greatest part of mankind float betwixt vice and virtne. Were one to go round the world with the intention of giving a good supper to the righteous and a sound drubbing to the wicked, he would frequently be embarrassed in his choice, and would find the merits and demerits of most men and women scarcely amount to the value of either.—David Hume.

HE [Carlyle] endeavored to persuade men that they ought to take no heed of the only motivs for action which existence affords us; that they ought to discover motivless motivs, and lead their lives for a purposeless purpose. He imagined these unthinkable propositions contained some supreme truth for the guidance of humanity, and as he addressed a public which was fast losing faith in theological figments, but which still retained the superstitious idea that theological morality was the only possible code of ethics, he succeeded in convincing a considerable proportion of his fellow-countrymen that there was something in them. Many men at the present moment desire to take refuge from a self-made bugbear of moral chaos in a logical suicide. They wish to think that life can be governed—not by motivs at all, but by some supposed substitute for an actual motiv, which does not exist and has never existed.—Grant Allen.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreadful disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

By Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B.

CONTENTS:

BOOK I.—PLEASURE: Chap. I.—Sources of Pleasure. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures. Chap IV.—Social Pleasures. Chap. V.—Pleasures of the Savage, the Barbarian and the Civilized. Chap. VI.—Genesis of religions. Chap. VII.—Christianity.

BOOK II.—INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Purpose of life. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures: Knowledge. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Reason. Chap.—V. Ideal Pleasures: Character. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Pedagogical Despotism.

BOOK III.—MORAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Morality. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures: Prudence. Chap. III.—Material Pleasures: Refinement. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Foresight, Chap. V.—Ideal Pleasures: Civilization. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Vice Caused by Restraint.

BOOK IV.—SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Progress. Chap. II.—Protection, Capitalism, and Socialism: Respectivly an Actual, an Imminent, and a Proposed Violation of Individual Sovereignty. Chap. III —Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism. Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject without mu h thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us·, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman,

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. The book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for its bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

Pleasure and Progress" has 398 pages, is splendidly printed from large, clear type, on excellent paper, and costs, bound in cloth, $1; paper covers, 50 cents.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

Not for Parsons.

APROPOS of the fascinations of golf, I heard the other day of a Scotchman, a retired minister of the kirk, who was deploring the tendency of the game to become a ruling passion, and also to induce bad language. "In fact," he said, "I had to giv it up for that reason." "Giv up golf!" exclaimed his friend. "No," said his reverence, "the meenistry."—London Truth.

THE Lord himself has, it would seem, been known to throw some humor into the praying business. When Sir Cloudesley Shovel, the famous admiral, set out on his last expedition, there was a form of prayer composed by the archbishop of Canterbury for the success of the fleet, in which his grace made use of the expression, that he "begged God would be a rock of defense to the fleet;" and God, it would appear, with grim humor, took him at his word, which occasioned the following lines to be put upon the monument set up for Shovel in Westminster Abbey, he being cast away in that expedition on the rocks called "The Bishop and his Clerks":

"As Lambeth prayed, such was the dire event,
Else had we wanted now this monument,
That God nnto our fleet would be a rock;
Nor did kind heaven the wise petition mock.
To what the metropolitan said then
'The Bishop and his Clerks' replied,
'Amen.'" —Saladin.

THE following affidavit was filed in the court of common pleas in Dublin in 1822: "And this deponent further saith that on arriving at the house of the said defendant, situate in the county of Galway aforesaid, for the purpose of personally serving him with the said writ, he, the said deponent, knocked three several times at the outer, commonly called the hall, door, but could not obtain admittance; whereupon this deponent was proceeding to knock a fourth time, when a man to this deponent unknown, holding in his hands a musket or blunderbuss, loaded with balls or slugs, as this deponent has since heard and verily believes, appeared at one of the upper windows of the said house, and, presenting said musket or blunderbuss at this deponent, threatened 'that if said deponent did not instantly retire, he would send his [the deponent's] soul to hell,' which this deponent verily believes he would hav done had not this deponent precipitately escaped."—The Green Bag.

STUTTERING BILL.

A story I fain would tell you
Of a "love feast" long ago;
'Twas told to me by a parson—
It surely must be so.

In the mountains of Kentucky
The Methodists were "having a time;"
A preacher from down in the "settlements,"
Was working the leading line.

His fame became noised o'er the mountains
And brought sinners from hill and from dell,
And many a "shiner" repented
In preference to going to hell.

They spoke at the love feasts at morning,
And prayed in the meetings at night,
And sang at all of the services
Till the hills were all filled with delight.

Among the nativs converted
Was one called "Stuttering Bill,"
And that he was to speak at the love feast
Was noised from hill to hill.

And "the boys" all fixed up a compact
That when Bill began to speak
They'd hav a little amusement,
Because of his stuttering squeak.

Now it seems that Bill had been dreaming,
Like the Bible Joseph of old,
Aud the incidents of one of the night previous
He wished at the love feast to unfold.

As he rose, he looked sober and thoughtful,
Then he braced himself up for the fight,
And began with his stuttering jargon:
"I-I-I h-h-h-had a dream last night."

But out in the audience before him
Sounded a voice both mirthful and shrill,
"'We can't hear you at this end of the church, sir;
Will you speak a little louder, please, Bill?"

Bill kindly took the suggestion,
And summed up his courage and might,
With one hand raised for a gesture—
"I-I-I h-h-h-had a dream last night."

Then from all parts of the church-house,
Like demons from a hell of gun-powder,
Came the voices of the moonshiners:
"Speak louder, Bill! Louder! LOUDER!"

Then Bill lost all his religion,
And puffed like an overdosed rat,
Catching breath for his greatest exertion—
"G-g-g-go to hell! D'ye hear that?"
—James Clarence Sousley.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclnsion regarding the great snbject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beanty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abnndant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmnch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of natnralism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of natnre universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has snddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two yonng girls and a yonnger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair edncation, and mnch courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The anthor is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among blnff bnsiness-men, kind-hearted folks, and disrepntable hypocrits. It is just snch a story of hnman life as we shonld expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. FIVE thousand more sheep hav been slaughtered in Colorado, this time near the Book Cliffs. Ranchers are in pursuit of the perpetrators of the crime and the shedding of human blood is probable.

THE Arkansas Populists are talkiug of enjoining Governor-elect Clarke from taking his office, although he has a majority of 24,000 on the face of the returns. The Populists allege wholesale frauds.

IN Alabama the Kolbite-Jeffersonian Democrats are indorsing the Republican nominees for Congress, and the probabilities now are that there will be but two tickets in the field in that state this fall.

SENATOR PEFFER is reported to hav said that Senator Martin cannot secure reelection because his course has not been satisfactory to the people of Kansas, and that he will be succeeded by a straight-out Populist.

LAST Sunday several Brooklyn and New York clergymen prepared "copy" for Monday newspaper advertising (type nearly all set on Sunday night) by delivering sermons in denunciation of Colonel Ingersoll's last article on suicide.

AFTER one of the most heated contests in the history of the organization, Col. Thomas G. Lawler, of Rockford, Ill., was elected commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic over Col. Ivan N. Walker, of Indianapolis, by the narrow majority of eleven, in a total vote of 649.

GENERAL ANTONIO EZETA, the Salvadorian refugee held for extradition by this government, has won in the extradition proceedings before Judge Morrow in San Francisco, and his friends are already figuring on how to make it uncomfortable for the present government of Salvador.

A NEW disinfectant has been discovered in coke oven by-products. It is extracted from a previously-unknown oil intermediate between the benzine series and the paraffin series. It possesses two of the most important desiderata in a disinfectant —insolubility in water and distribution by water.

CONTROLLER ROBERTS of this state for several months has been making a quiet investigation into the state's landed interests in the Adirondacks, and the result of his efforts will lead to proceedings that may force some of the state's sworn officers to indemnify the state heavily for betrayal of their trust.

A MILITARY court of inquiry held to investigate the conduct of several militia companies of the state of Washington during the late railway strike, has recommended the disbandment of Company C of Spokane and the discharge of Capt. J. W. Stearnes of Tekoa. Governor McGraw has approved the finding.

NEW YORK Populists put in nomination for governor Charles B. Matthews and for judge of the court of appeals Thaddeus B. Wakeman. To raise money for campaign purposes the friends of the party sent to the convention from all parts of the state fruits, vegetables, and miscellaneous articles and these were auctioned off at good prices.

CARDINAL VAUGHAN, speaking at the Catholic conference in Preston, England, September 10th, said that the reunion of Christendom was coming nearer every day. So rapid had been the movement in the Anglican church during the last fifty years that it had often been impossible to distinguish between the Roman and Anglican churches.

THE result of the Democratic primaries in the Ashland district of Kentucky are apparently in doubt at this time (Monday morning). The Owens men claim that he has a plurality of 410, while the friends of Breckinridge assert that it is not more than 169, and that the official count will be necessary to determin who is selected. There may be a contest.

THE New York police commissioners will discontinue trials of accused officials while the Lexow committee is pursuing its investigations, so as not to impede the latter's work. Witnesses who hav testified before the committee and the commissioners are being arrested with surprising frequency. It looks much like persecution intended to terrorize others who may hav anything to tell.

THE state department has received a dispatch from Minister Terrell at Constantinople stating that the explorations of Dr. Peters and Professor Heilpricht at Niffer, near Babylon, hav added one thousand years to the known history of the human race. The expenses of this expedition are borne by an association of Philadelphia gentlemen, formed under the name of the "Babylonian Exploration Fund."

THE Memphis grand jury has returned three more indictments—making thirteen in all—against persons implicated in the Millington lynching of six negro prisoners accused of setting fire to barns. Nearly all the men indicted are prominent citizens, most of them ex office holders, office holders, or aspirants for office. The grand jury uses very strong language in regard to the lynching, and intimates that it has been impeded in its work by certain officials.

BY the terms of peace accepted by Chili and Peru at the close of their last war, Chili was to hold the Peruvian province of Tacna for ten years. The revenue derived from the nitrate beds of this province is enormous and as the end of the ten years term of Chilian control approaches it is found that that government has colonized the province with people who are strongly opposed to becoming subject to Peru. The consequence is that there is great probability of another war between the two nations.

TO CUT down expenses the government of Italy has decided to reduce the number of provinces from 69 to 23; of tribunals from 180 to 89; abolish the courts of cassation in Palermo, Naples, Florence, and Turin; convert twenty-three universities into private institutions, and create state universities in Rome and Naples. The Catholics see in this a sign of degeneracy caused by the overthrow of the temporal power of the Pope, but it may more truly be said to be a wise cutting down of expenses through the abolition of useless offices.

THE news from the Chinese-Japanese war is not very definit, but it appears that the Japanese hav lately suffered some considerable reverses. At least, they are not winning in a dash as they had hoped to do, and which seemed to be their only chance. The very latest is to the effect that the Japanese won a decided victory in Corea last Sunday, capturing the fortified town of Ping-Yang. The Chinese lost sixteen thousand men, killed, wounded, and prisoners, including many high officers, among whom was the commander-in-chief of the Manchoorian army.

THE joint British-United States survey of the boundary line between Alaska and the English possessions has progressed so far that it is known that Mount St. Elias, heretofore supposed to be the highest peak on the continent, is not on the soil of the United States. Its altitude was found to be 18,023 feet, considerably more than had been previously estimated, but less than that of two, if not three, other mountains a few miles further inland, on English territory. One of these, Mount Logan, is 19,534 feet in hight, and the other two over-reach Mount St. Elias by several feet.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Priestly Celibacy Exposed A lecture by the Rev. Geo. Townsend Fox, of Durham, England. Revised American edition, showing the result in parishes of the Roman decree that priests shall not mary. Price, paper, 15 cents.

SOME PROBLEMS FOR CHRISTIANS TO CONSIDER.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people hav time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we hav prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the fund and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

Will some friend in each of the states of California, Idaho, Montana, Washington, and Wisconsin send to Judge Hector W. Haight, of Farmington, Utah, a copy of the constitution of his or her state or giv him the address of the Secretary of State? The Freethinkers of Utah are very anxious to draft a perfect constitution for the coming state, and they want to see just what has been done in other commonwealths. If any Freethinker in any of the states named, or in any other, knows of a particularly good provision in the organic law of his state, it will be well to transcribe it and forward to Judge Haight. That earnest Freethinker will be very thankful for any information that will help him and his co-workers to bring about the desired result—the establishment of a free state for a free people.

Plain Enough.

Anent the public protest of Mary Desha against the re-election of Colonel Breckinridge or the election of any other man of similar character from the Ashland district, and her enumeration in the same category with Colonel Breckinridge of ex-Representativ Taulbee and Colonel Thompson, the New York Independent says:

"Why should the Kentucky delegation in Congress hav had such a reputation for immorality? What is there peculiar in the civilization of that state? There has not been any lack of religious teaching. We hav been told that there is not an Infidel in Kentucky. But that state has long been famous for the lawless violence, the vendetta feuds of its mountain region; and now one who knows it thoroughly says that its Blue Grass section sends to Congress the most immoral delegation in Washington. The statement seems justified by the fact that a man of fine birth and connections and great ability just convicted of adultery and perjury, expects nevertheless to be returned to Congress from its proudest district. What is the reason of this bad preëminence? How will the men who hav had the care of the morals and religion of the state explain it; or will they simply ignore it and not think it worth while to print Miss Desha's letter?"

The Independent's perplexity is somewhat amusing, when we take into consideration the common orthodox idea, which it apparently shares, that the "Infidel" is to be expected to be a villain and the Christian a paragon of all the virtues. It cannot understand why there should be any exception to the good old rule. By the way, our National Reformer friends should giv a thought to this Kentucky marvel. Mary Desha wants a man elected to Congress from the Ashland district who has "brains enough to know that it is a man's actions and not his religious twaddle that make for righteousness, and not brains enough to fool a whole community for half a century into thinking him a Christian and a gentleman, when he is directly the reverse." But do not the theocrats and others of related bent of mind fear that, in striving to keep out of office all but Christians, they will merely succeed in getting good berths for men who hav not only brains enough to make a skilful use of "religious twaddle," but also enough to fool whole communities into thinking them to be Christians? In other words, are not the Covenanters and moralists offering big rewards for hypocrits, and will they not get them, and in the end find in official positions ten times the number of shady characters that would hav got there if the only standard of fitness for public life had been mental and ethical capacity to faithfully transact the business of their respectiv offices? When you make a man a hypocrit you start him on a downward career which is the easiest road in the world to travel.

State Aid to Charitable Institutions.

The New York Constitutional Convention is finally through with its work on the constitution of this state, so far as education and charities are concerned. The educational amendment was accepted in precisely the form that we hav heretofore quoted and condemned. The charities article nullifies, to a considerable extent, the prohibitions of the educational article. How this is done will be seen upon turning to the text of the two sections we hav quoted below.

Mr. Choate has been one of the leaders in the movement for a change of status as regards the support of education and charity, and he was one of the chief speakers in the Convention on the 14th inst. In the beginning of his remarks he said that for very many years he had been connected with the State Charities Aid Society and with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. When he first came to the Convention he found that a "very decided raid" was being made upon the Convention with the intention of preventing the payment of any money whatever to any sectarian institutions, and if the charges which he had heard before the assembling of the Convention, concerning alleged abuses in some of those institutions, had been sustained, "perhaps it would hav justified the cutting off of all public money from them." After investigation he was satisfied that the charges were unfounded and had their source in a sentiment with which he had no sympathy—namely, "a fear, a hatred for the Roman Catholic church as a religious body." Then he added:

"If it were an original question, I should be in favor of prohibiting the use of any public money, the application of any public money, to any private charity, and I think you will see in a few minutes that there is ground for that. But, as I consider unfortunately, some twenty years ago this state, as a state, departed from that rule. They found these children in public institutions herded in with paupers and criminals, and so the state deliberately entered by its law upon a scheme of using the agency of private charities for the purpose of taking care of the wards of the state."

While such was the origin of the existing system there is found in that fact no justification for its indefinit continuance if any better system can be applied, of which there can be no doubt. Mr. Choate himself shows that grave abuses hav developed, and it is reasonable to suppose that they will not grow less as the years pass if a radical change is not instituted. It remains to be seen what the state Board of Charities will do to remedy conditions, if the proposed amendment is adopted and they are thus given new powers. Messrs. Choate and Lauterbach state that there are dependent upon the eighteen hundred thousand people of this city eighteen thousand children of charity, or one for each one hundred persons. In the rest of the state there are eight thousand dependent upon four million seven hundred thousand people. Why has New York city such an excessiv proportion of these dependent ones? Let Mr. Choate answer:

"Now, how does that come? Of course, it ought not to be that there should be for one hundred persons in a great city like New York a child dependent upon charity for support. Now, I will tell you how it has come about. It has come about by this very method of dispensing public charity through private institutions. It has tended to the pauperizing of a whole people, and there is an abuse that certainly ought to be checked, and the object of one of the clauses that I insist be put in this amendment is that it should be checked.

"What is there that exists among these institutions in the city of New York that tends to pauperizing? In the first place, children are placed by their own parents even, without commitment, or, if a commitment is wanted, by going to the first magistrate and having their own children, whom they are perfectly well able to support, put upon these institutions for their support in very large numbers.

"And then there is another abuse growing out of it, and that is that children are kept there, not as a temporary refuge, but for years and years, up to the age of sixteen, I believe, long after they ought to be placed in families and no longer held to be raised as paupers, if you please, or semi-paupers, in one of these institutions.

"Now, what do I want to accomplish on behalf of these children? It is that there shall be a power in the state that has never been exercised before to go through these institutions, any year, any week, or any day, and lay its hands upon this child, and upon that child, and say: 'You shall not receive one dollar for that child, because its parents are perfectly able to support it.'"

If these institutions did not receive from the state, for the support of each of its wards committed to their care, more than the support of the child costs, they would very quickly and effectually guard against being imposed upon in this way by scheming parents. But so long as there is a per capita profit they are well content with the system. If the state cared for them in its own institutions, under a system of rigid inspection by officers changed with each inspection and the time of inspection always kept a secret beforehand, the evil might be reduced to a minimum. As matters now are there is no show for the taxpayer. Mr. Choate was told of a man in Albany who had a job about the capitol at twenty-two dollars per week and who had three children in one of these institutions! Abuses such as this can be prevented, Mr. Choate thinks, by giving the commissioners of charities ample powers of inspection and removal. He says:

"And there is another thing as to these children—they are kept very long after they ought to be in families and attendants upon the public school. I want the same power, the public arm, to reach within those institutions and say: 'These children you may keep as long as you please on your own money, but not a dollar of public money shall be paid for them after they hav reached an age and condition when they ought to hav been turned out of this pauper establishment.'"

That these institutions are receiving far more public money than they spend in the care of wards of the state is intimated by Mr. Choate in this paragraph:

"Then there are other things that result from this same cause. These institutions are being built up. The founders and the patrons and the managers being very much interested in them, it is their earnest desire to build up the institutions, and they get in as many as they can and keep them as long as they can. And I am not speaking of any one sect. Now, what will happen? This constitutional amendment being ordered, the state Board of Charities will lay down rules and regulations, and this abuse to which I refer can be and will be rooted out. The admission will be made more difficult, and the exit will be made more easy. The difficulty is that it is infinitly easy to get a child into one of these institutions and infinitly difficult to get it out. So, then, instead of having to provide for 18,000, that number ought to be reduced by at least one-half."

Still nothing is discussed but mitigation; the tearing up of the wrong by the roots is not considered. The proposed amendment provides for the secular education of the inmates of such institutions. But fifty per cent of them should receive that education in the common schools, Mr. Choate thinks:

"The provision that shall be made for the maintenance of secular education in these institutions savors of the terrible evil that exists there. I care not if they are better fed and better clothed and better taught than they would be at home. That is not the question. Are they proper wards of the state? Are they mendicants? I believe that one-half of them are not. They ought to be thrown back on their parents; they ought to be thrown out of these institutions, placed in families, and put where they can be taken care of in the ordinary way, as members of society and attendants upon the public school."

And after you hav taken out all of those who should not be there, what then? How should those who remain be educated? The gentleman says:

"As for the matter of religious education, why, there cannot be any two opinions about that. The religion that a child is born in is the best for that child, at any rate until it can attain the years when it can think and act for itself. Let every institution, let every parent, let every sect teach its own child in its own tenets, and teach those at its own expense, but the reading, writing, and arithmetic must be provided by the public."

The trouble is right here. If the state appropriates money to sectarian institutions for the secular education of its dependents, how will it be determined that this money is fairly expended for that purpose? Who is to tell that religious instruction has not monopolized the lion's share of an appropriation? Will two sets of teachers be employed? Hardly. But here are the two sections of the proposed amendment which bear upon the question at issue between genuin friends of the secular state and theocratic Christians. Let us see what they say:

"Nothing in this constitution contained shall prevent the legislature from making such provision for the education and support of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenil delinquents, as it may deem proper, or prevent any county, city, town, or village, from providing for the care, support, maintenance, and secular education of inmates of orphan asylums, homes for dependent children, or correctional institutions, whether under public or private control.

"Payments by companies, cities, towns, and villages to charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, and reformatory institutions, wholly or partly under private control or care, support, and maintenance, may be authorized, but shall not be required, by the legislature. No such payments shall be made for any inmate of such institutions who is not received and retained therein pursuant to rules established by the state Board of Charities. Such rules shall be subject to the control of the legislature by general laws."

What is gained, then, by this charities amendment? One thing and one thing only, if the commissioners do their duty; nothing if they do not. If they do their duty, their inspection of these institutions will in a large measure prevent the abuses of which Mr. Choate has told us—the orphanages and reformatories will not be overcrowded with children who hav no business there, and so the state will be saved one big item of expense. But the adoption of this amendment will not touch the principle of state aid to sectarian institutions; by authorizing the appropriation of public money to pay for secular education therein it opens the way for the grossest abuses as regards religious instruction; giving the legislature the power to authorize "companies, cities, towns, and villages" to make payments to charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, and reformatory institutions, wholly or partly under private control, care, support, and maintenance," is to greatly aggravate the actual and potential evils of the present system, and, finally, we hav the specific declaration that nothing in the constitution (including, of course, the pending amendment forbidding appropriations to sectarian schools), shall operate to prevent the full harvest of wrong and disaster from being reaped by the people of this state. The sum total of effect of the two amendments taken together is that no state money can be appropriated to parochial schools. Sectarian "charities" can still fatten on the public; sectarian teachers will still be paid for imparting alleged "secular" instruction within their walls; the Bible will remain in the public schools, and prayers and hymns will continue to echo there; state funds will still go to the institutions of higher learning, despite their religious services—all they will hav to guard against will be the preaching of "denominational" tenets—they can advocate the general principles of Christianity all they please.

To us this whole struggle in the Constitutional Convention has all the appearance of having been a sectarian farce, cunningly played with high tragedy stage properties. We do not believe that it was ever the intention of any of the "powers behind the throne" to do one thing more than has been done. We believe that it was all along the intention to do just that thing and stop. Every act that has been done and every act that has been left undone points straight to this conclusion. It was never the intention of any of the Protestant societies with high-sounding names which hav been engaged openly or secretly in this business to secure an amendment that would effect all sects, that would operate to actually and completely separate church and state. None of these societies, as a society, has a bit of sympathy with the Demands of Liberalism. One of these organizations claimed to hav one hundred and ten of its members among the delegates to the Republican state convention the other day, and they were able to easily defeat a gentleman who wanted the nomination for lieutenant-governor. "His boom withered in an hour," although his following had been very strong. It was intimated that the association had at its command one hundred thousand votes, which would be cast against the party if the convention refused to heed the warning. We mention this incident here to show the strength of these orders, and we insist that the power which could thus bend a great party to its will could hav forced the majority in the Constitutional Convention—said majority representing the same party—to prepare and submit an amendment that would not hav left a vestige of the union of church and state in the Constitution and laws of the state of New York. It could hav done this. It did not do it. It did not want to do it. Its affiliated societies did not want to do it. They did not want to do a single thing that would militate against Protestant control of education. And they did not. What they did do did not hav its inspiration in universal and elevated principles of statesmanship, but in sectarian partialism and hatred. They made a great pretense of cutting off state appropriations to sectarian institutions, but undoubtedly the ridiculous outcome is precisely what from the first it was intended to be by the leaders. A large proportion of such institutions are under Protestant control, and here they could not damage the Catholics without hurting their own brethren. To hav made instruction in the public schools wholly secular would hav been a blow at both Protestantism and Christianity itself, as they view the question of education. But as the Catholics are the only ones who wish separate schools, it was very easy to be "patriotic."

Completely divorce church and state; in this only is safety.

As it was in the Chicago Times that Mr. Putnam read the Cleveland resolution unfortunately adopted by the Topeka Convention, he sent to that paper a disclaimer of sympathy with the form, spirit, and substance of the resolution, and accompanied his protest with a copy of the Demands of Liberalism, which he said constituted the sole platform of organized Freethought. His communication and the Demands were printed in full.

Under the side head of "Purity," a late number of the Christian Statesman had this item:

"Kentucky horsemen hav organized for the avowed purpose of defeating Congressman W. C. P. Breckinridge if he is nominated. For that purpose $20,000 hav been raised and it will be placed where it will do the most good."

It is slightly dubious where the "purity" comes in, when we reflect how such large campaign funds are usually employed. And then without doubt a good share of that $20,000 was won on the race track, which still further complicates the purity problem, especially for the Christian Statesman people.

In time of peace prepare far war; in two or three months Congress and the state legislatures will be in session again, and then the theocrats will be ready for work. They never sleep, and we must not until this is a secular republic beyond challenge. Be prepared to coöperate with the Freethought Federation when the time comes to meet the enemies of religious liberty in the halls of legislation. Secure subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER; sell Liberal books and distribute Liberal tracts; effect an organization of our people, whenever possible, and keep yourselvs and your neighbors thoroughly informed as to the designs and movements of the aggressiv church party.

At a meeting of the Ministers' Alliance of Denver, Rev. R. N. Barnes made a plea for a combination of the churches to work against the taxation of the property of the ecclesiastical corporations, and a committee of three was appointed to take the matter under advisement. That was a decidedly cool proceeding, and it is safe to say that it will hasten rather than retard the coming of the day when every dollar's worth of church wealth will bear its just share of the public burdens. The unjust privilege which its beneficiaries find it necessary to combine to retain is nearing its term, and its destruction is inevitable in the near future.

The Presbyterian Journal tells us that a "ruling-elder" says that recently at a seaside resort, in a hotel where there were hundreds of guests, the most of them church members, he was the only one who went to church on Sunday. He is satisfied that great numbers of professing Christians fail to take their Bibles with them when they go on their vacations, and leave behind their church-going and other devotional habits. Why not? With most of them church-going is only a social duty, more or less perfunctorily performed, and when people go away on vacation they go to rest, do they not? Why then continue to work on Sunday?

Proscription for opinion's sake is utterly distasteful to the true Freethinker. He does not believe in the political, social, or business ostracism of those whose beliefs differ from his own. He attacks creeds, not those who accept them. If they attempt to force their beliefs upon him through the law, he will defend himself as the occasion and his danger demands. But he will not defame the masses of a church nor of a race, nor attempt their disfranchisment or banishment because of the offensiv utterances or invasiv acts of individuals. Freethought judges men by their own personal conduct, not by the personal conduct of their fellow-countrymen or their fellow-believers, nor yet by their creed label or their mother tongue. Only the narrowest sectarists are guilty of this offense.

Please look over (not overlook) what we hav to say on page 610. There you will see how to get some very valuable books on decidedly favorable terms. The premiums offered—which include Putnam's masterpiece, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought"—are books that every Freethinker wants in his house, and now is the time to begin to look out for reading matter for the long winter evenings. In connection with our successful "Missionary Scheme" of sending eight copies of the "Age of Reason" to separate addresses for $1, we now invite our subscribers to hav THE TRUTH SEEKER forwarded to their Christian or other friends on trial for three months for only fifty cents. It should be easy to secure clubs of trial subscribers in every neighborhood. Anyway, read page 610.

Is it coming to this that ministers cannot say what they please in their prayers? Can they no longer call people sinners and direct the scoffing attention of their neighbors to them in their (the preachers') confidential talks with God? Rev. J. W. Campbell, of the First Methodist church of Los Angeles, California, is in trouble because he prayed after this fashion for Miss Tessa L. Kelso, librarian of the public library of that city: "O Lord, vouchsafe thy saving grace to the librarian of the Los Angeles city library, and cleanse her of all sin, and make her a woman worthy of her office." Miss Kelso did not like the implication in this prayer, and so she has sued Mr. Campbell for damages in the sum of $5,000. It seems that there was in the library a book in the French language (which language Miss Kelso does not read), and that volume is the cause of the trouble. During more than a year the work was taken out but once, as the record shows. Then a clergyman got hold of it, and soon thereafter about every official and many unofficial pious persons in the city had gone to the library for the book. This shows what a keen scent some classes of people hav. But if Miss Kelso wins her suit some of them may hereafter be a little careful about giving themselvs away in the pulpit. If the California courts decide that libellous prayers are not "privileged communications," the preaching industry will be shorn of one of its most spicy attractions for both the actors and the audiences.

It is currently reported that all members of the Salvation Army are ordered to read nothing but the Bible and such literature as comes from Army headquarters. If this is true, what becomes of the assertion that Protestants lay no interdict upon the free investigation of all questions, which assertion has been made almost in terms by one nominally not a Protestant? As a matter of fact and of course, all churches much prefer that their adherents should leave severely alone whatever publications are not wholly friendly to their doctrins, and nearly all of them are prepared to exert all the moral influence and ecclesiastical authority that they can command to secure a complete tabooing of all hostil literature. Fortunately for the freedom of the press and of speech, there are a multitude of sects and many cliques and parties, which find it impossible to harmonize their conflicting opinions and interests and in combination crush out dissent. In this aspect of the struggle in this country, it is not pleasant to perceive indications of "Christian union." We already know the danger of such a confederation. Where the sectarists hav united on so-called "moral" grounds they hav given us some of the worst legislation that curses our people. Freethinkers should avoid affiliation with all religious or semi-religious socities the tendency of whose work is to help break down the barriers between the sects. Until such time as evolution has accomplished its perfect work and developed a new school of theologians having no desire to persecute for opinion's sake, our safety will depend chiefly on the maintenance of a "balance of power" between the various denominations.

It is a very convenient arrangement to hav religion and political government united; by this plan the "powers that be" can bring to the support of any questionable governmental measure the united army of priests of the state church. No doubt our American theocrats hav carefully considered this, and hence their phenomenal activity in the work of Christianizing the Constitution and laws. We here call their attention to a Russian law, "promulgated lately by the Czar himself." It makes duelling obligatory upon all officers of the army, not only when they think themselvs insulted, but likewise when others think they hav cause for an appeal to the code. No matter if the principals themselvs can see no cause for fighting, they must fight nevertheless if the "court of honor," instituted in accordance with the new law, decides that they must do so. If either refuses to obey the command he must leave the army. It has already happened that duels hav taken place over some word carelessly spoken when the challenger and the challenged were the best of friends and had no desire whatever to imperil each other's lives. But one officer has had the courage to refuse to fight when ordered to do so by the "court of honor." "He had no abstract objection to dueling itself, · · · but he had a decided objection to kill or maim in time of peace a man who had done him no ill whatever." It is somewhat peculiar, were we to judge religion by the pretensions of its advocates, that since the promulgation of the imperial ukase named, dueling has been taken under the protection of the orthodox church. Is there any iniquity which state-fed Christianity will not sanction if that iniquity is winked at or committed by the power that feeds it? Is there any single event or lesson in the history of the world that would encourage us to work for or permit a closer alliance of religion and politics in the United States?

What a contrast there is between the broad, statemanlike, humanitarian attitude of Colonel Ingersoll on the question of equal religious liberty, and the narrow, bigoted, vindictiv, Christain position taken by a Western paper that weekly givs forth a burlesque version of Freethought principles! Read again (on page 614 of this issue, bottom of first column,) the eighth paragraph of the interview reprinted from the New York Herald, and then contrast its spirit and its fidelity to facts with the spirit and wild assertions of the following excerpt from the paper indicated:

"The happiest day for this country will be the day when a war is inaugurated for the extermination of the Catholic conspiracy from this continent. The Catholic church is in no sense a religion, it is a political organization, whose purpose is power and plunder. The infamous and bloody organization should be ousted from American soil. · · · Not being a system of religion, but a system of plunder, and the enemy of liberty, it cannot claim the protection of our constitution and laws. It has never done anything but plot and conspire against liberty, and extort a living from the hand of honest labor. Do we need such an institution in this country?"

As we hav repeatedly declared and as Colonel Ingersoll clearly shows, an overwhelming majority faithful to freedom needs not to resort to persecution in order to defend itself from the machination of any minority, even were that minority unanimously hostil to liberty. If the majority stands loyally for equal rights it cannot ostracise, imprison, nor expatriate; if it ostracizes, imprisons, or expatriates, it betrays liberty and is therefore ten-fold more to be feared than the minority which it bullies and "exterminates." All that is needed is to stand inflexibly firm in defense of the secular state. Freethinkers can join in no sectarian crusades whose battle cries are but horrible echoes from the Dark Ages.

Speaking of the memories aroused by the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic in Pittsburg two weeks ago, the Christian Statesman says:

"But the main thought that has come to our own mind has found no expression that we hav found in the daily papers or in the proceedings thus far of the encampment. And this thought is the gratitude we owe to God for saving us from the destruction that threatened us in that dreadful period of our history. It is true, some of the pulpits of Pittsburg and Allegheny the preceding Sabbath echoed and re-echoed the above and other kindred thoughts. But the expression of all such sense of obligation to God is conspicuously wanting in the proceedings of the Grand Army of the Republic and in the reports and editorials of the daily press. And this is the one lesson above all others that a reunion like this should impress upon the nation's heart."

"The one lesson above all others" that would hav been impressed upon the mind of a really thoughtful person as he looked upon the marching columns of prematurely old and crippled men would hav been the utter baselessness of the theological assumption that there was anything to thank a God for in connection with the Civil War. Nothing could be more illogical than that assumption. On the theory that God "doeth all things" and that therefore we should thank him because the rebellion did not eventuate in the destruction of the nation, it follows by a parity of reasoning that we should curse him for precipitating that awful conflict upon us. If there exists a God of infinit wisdom and power, no man or nation is under the slightest obligations to him for alleged favors. Infinit ability carries with it infinit responsibility. If it were possible that the god of Theism were an actuality, the people of the United States, instead of thanking him because they managed to overthrow the rebellion, should loathe him and teach their children to speak his name in shuddering horror, because he had created them with the deliberate intention that they should, and the full knowledge that they would, be plunged into that hell of fratricidal strife. How much longer will apparently sensible men and women be victimized by this transparent confidence game of the medicin men?

The New York Sun some time ago became very solicitous about the health of religious communicants. It fears microbes in the communion cup, and holds that instead of the common cup there should be an individual cup for each communicant. This and other agitation has lead at least one church to try the innovation, while editors, doctors, preachers, and lay members of churches have joined in the discussion. Recently three correspondents of the Sun hav put themselvs on record in defense of the time-honored common cup. They hold that very few instances of contagion hav been reported, and that God will miraculously intervene to protect from infection all who partake of the sacred elements in accordance with the example set by Jesus. In the words of the Sun, "they treat the scientific criticism of the practice by laymen as unjustifiable. irreverent, and blasphemous interference with a holy mystery, before which all mankind should bow with unquestioning faith and obedience." To this the Sun replies that such is the position of the extreme believers, who think that St. James was right when he commanded that the faithful should not call a physician when sick, but should depend on the healing power of prayer. It also says that some Baptists exhibit this faith when they baptize converts in the river through a hole cut in the ice. According to this theory, it continues, they should take no precautions if a victim of small pox should come to the altar and drink from the cup. Then the newspaper drives the ardent devotees into a corner in this wise:

"If God, in contravention of his natural laws, protects from the danger of contagion all those who drink from the common chalice at the communion, the presence at the sacrament of a victim of small-pox and his participation in it, would be powerless for harm to other communicants, whether they were vaccinated or not. If God guards one ceremony of his obligatory worship by the exercise of miraculous power, must he not also guard them all in the same way, so that the imposition of sanitary regulations on the churches by the health department is impious and blasphemous? Neither can the fire department enforce against them its prohibitory requirements with a view to saving their congregations from danger, except by dishonoring the Almighty. Practically, however, such safeguards are applied to churches like other places of public assembly, and piety recognizes their necessity and demands their enforcement."

Rev. Johnston Myers, of Cincinnati, in common with very many of his fellow clergymen, appears to think that Colonel Ingersoll's recent letters on the subject of suicide giv the gentlemen of the cloth an excellent opportunity to attack the eloquent Freethinker. Mr. Myers seems to be even more careless of his facts than ministers usually are, which is saying a great deal. The New York papers reported that one of two persons who committed suicide together in Central Park had read and made some written favorable comment on Colonel Ingersoll's first letter to the World. This enables the veracious Mr. Myers to say:

"Since Mr. Ingersoll set forth his defense twelve persons in and around New York city hav taken their own lives and made some mention of Mr. Ingersoll's theories."

Evidently this representativ of God would make a good Oriental war correspondent. Here is another sample of his imaginativ products:

"A prominent unbeliever in this city said to me, 'I think all the world is selfish and bad. I won't help anyone. When I die I wish them to bury me like a dog.'"

Has Mr. Myers any objection to communicating the name and address of this "prominent unbeliever" to us or to the secretary of the Ohio Liberal Society? But it is not until he begins to expatiate on courage that Mr. Myers becomes really eloquent. Hear him:

"Infidelity is cowardly. · · · It takes courage to face the battle of life and fight it through to the end. It is the work of a shirk and a coward to bring disgrace and dishonor to others by ignominiously and cowardly giving up. · · · Infidelity makes men hopeless and cowardly, while the gospel makes them brave and cheerful."

It is impossible for one to realize how intense is Rev. Mr. Myer's admiration for courage until he is made acquainted with the fact that the Liberals of Cincinnati hav found it entirely beyond their power to get him to debate the questions at issue between Christians and Freethinkers with any representativ of Liberalism in the country, although he never misses an opportunity to assail and misrepresent Freethinkers and Freethought principles. In addition to the virtues already named, he is intensely "patriotic," in the latter-day, secret society sense.

If the love of God is in your heart enough so that you can see only virtue in him, there must be something rotten about your heart.

Ingersoll's Views on Religion.

Interview in the New York Herald.

"Which do you regard as the better, Catholicism or Protestantism?"

"Protestantism," said Colonel Ingersoll, "is better than Catholicism, because there is less of it. Protestantism does not teach that a monk is better than a husband and father, that a nun is holier than a mother. Protestants do not believe in the confessional. Neither do they pretend that priests can forgive sins. Protestantism has fewer ceremonies and less opera bouffe, clothes, caps, tiaras, miters, crooks, and holy toys. Catholics have an infallible man—an old Italian. Protestants have an infallible book written by Hebrews before they were civilized. The infallible man is generally wrong and the infallible book is filled with mistakes and contradictions. Catholics and Protestants are both enemies of intellectual freedom—of real education. The Catholic believes in education enough to make a Catholic of a savage, and the Protestant believes in education enough to make a Protestant of a Catholic, but both are opposed to education enough to make free men and women.

"Nothing is more absurd than the Catholic creed, unless it be that of the Protestants, and nothing can be more absurd than the Protestant creed, unless it be that of the Catholics. Both churches are the enemies of progress, and both sell sin and crime on credit. Both teach the doctrines of forgiveness Both tell the murderer if he will only repent he will go straight from the scaffold to paradise. Both tell the thief that there will be more joy in heaven when he repents than over a hundred honest men. Both promise eternal reward for belief and both threaten everlasting pain for those who think. The Catholics have always persecuted to the extent of their power; so have the Protestants. The Protestants acted like fiends in Geneva, in Scotland, in New England, and the Catholics acted like fiends wherever and whenever they had the power. Between the Catholics and the Protestants there has been about as much difference as there is between the crocodiles and alligators. Both have done the worst they could, both are as bad as they can be, and the world is getting tired of both. The world is not going to change either; both are to be rejected."

"Are you willing to give your opinion of the Pope?"

"It may be that the Pope thinks he is infallible, but I doubt it. He may think that he is the agent of God, but I guess not. He may know more than other people, but if he does he has kept it to himself. He does not seem satisfied with standing in the place and stead of God in spiritual matters, but desires temporal power. He wishes to be Pope and king. He imagines that he has the right to control the belief of all the world; that he is the shepherd of all 'sheep,' and that the fleeces belong to him. He thinks that in his keeping is the conscience of mankind. So he imagines that his blessing is a great benefit to the faithful, and that his prayers can change the course of natural events. He is a strange mixture of the serious and comical. He claims to represent God, and admits that he is almost a prisoner. There is something pathetic in the condition of this pontiff. When I think of him I think of Lear on the heath, old, broken, touched with insanity, and yet, in his own opinion, 'Every inch a king.'

"The Pope is a fragment, a remnant, a shred, a patch of the ancient power and glory. He is a survival of the unfittest, a souvenir of theocracy, a relic of the supernatural. Of course he will have a few successors, and they will become more and more comical, more and more helpless and impotent as the world grows wise and free. I am not blaming the Pope. He was poisoned at the breast of his mother. Superstition was mingled with her milk. He was poisoned at school—taught to distrust his reason and to live by faith. And so it may be that his mind was so twisted and tortured out of shape that he now really believes that he is the infallible agent of an infinite God."

"Are you in favor of the American Protective Association?"

"In this country I see no need of secret political societies. I think it better to fight in the open field. I am a believer in religious liberty, in allowing all sects to preach their doctrines and to make as many converts as they can. As long as we have free speech and a free press I think there is no danger of the country being ruled by any church. The Catholics are much better than their creed, and the same can be said of nearly all members of orthodox churches. A majority of American Catholics think a great deal more of this country than they do of their church. When they are in good health they are on our side. It is only when they are very sick that they turn their eyes toward Rome. If they were in the majority, of course, they would destroy all other churches, and imprison, torture, and kill all Infidels. But they will never be in the majority. They increase now only because Catholics come from other countries. In a few years that supply will cease, and then the Catholic church will grow weaker every day. The free secular school is the enemy of priestcraft and superstition, and the people of this country will never consent to the destruction of that institution. I want no man persecuted on account of his religion. I give to every other human being every right that I claim for myself."

"If there is no beatitude, or heaven, how do you account for the continual struggle in every natural heart for its own betterment?"

"Man has many wants, and all his efforts are the children of wants. If he wanted nothing he would do nothing. We civilize the savage by increasing his wants, by cultivating his fancy, his appetites, his desires. He is then willing to work to satisfy these new wants. Man always tries to do things in the easiest way. His constant effort is to accomplish more with less work. He invents a machine; then he improves it, his idea being to make it perfect. He wishes to produce the best. So in every department of effort and knowledge he seeks the highest success, and he seeks it because it is for his own good here in this world. So he finds that there is a relation between happiness and conduct, and he tries to find out what he must do to produce the greatest enjoyment. This is the basis of morality, of law and ethics. We are so constituted that we love proportion, color, harmony. This is the artistic man. Morality is the harmony and proportion of conduct—the music of life. Man continually seeks to better his condition—not because he is immortal—but because he is capable of grief and pain, because he seeks for happiness. Man wishes to respect himself and to gain the respect of others. The brain wants light, the heart wants love. Growth is natural. The struggle to overcome temptation, to be good and noble, brave and sincere, to reach, if possible, the perfect, is no evidence of the immortality of the soul or of the existence of other worlds. Men live to excel, to become distinguished, to enjoy, and so they strive, each in his own way, to gain the ends desired."

"Do you believe that the race is growing moral or immoral?"

"The world is growing better. There is more real liberty, more thought, more intelligence than ever before. The world was never so charitable or generous as now. We do not put honest debtors in prison, we no longer believe in torture. Punishments are less severe. We place a higher value on human life. We are far kinder to animals. To this, however, there is one terrible exception. The vivisectors, those who cut, torture, and mutilate in the name of science, disgrace our age. They excite the horror and indignation of all good people. Leave out the actions of those wretches, and animals are better treated than ever before. So there is less beating of wives and whipping of children. The whip is no longer found in the civilized home. Intelligent parents now govern by kindness, love, and reason. The standard of honor is higher than ever. Contracts are more sacred, and men do nearer as they agree. Man has more confidence in his fellow man, and in the goodness of human nature. Yes, the world is getting better, nobler, and grander every day. We are moving along the highway of progress on our way to the Eden of the future."

"Are the doctrines of Agnosticism gaining ground, and what, in your opinion, will be the future of the church?"

"The Agnostic is intellectually honest. He knows the limitations of his mind. He is convinced that the questions of origin and destiny cannot be answered by man. He knows that he cannot answer these questions, and he is candid enough to say so. The Agnostic has good mental manners. He does not call belief, or hope, or wish a demonstration. He knows the difference between hope and belief—between belief and knowledge—and he keeps these distinctions in his mind. He does not say that a certain theory is true because he wishes it to be true. He tries to go according to evidence, in harmony with facts, without regard to his own desires or the wish of the public. He has the courage of his convictions and the modesty of his ignorance. The theologian is his opposite. He is certain and sure of the existence of things and beings and worlds of which there is, and can be, no evidence. He relies on assertion, and in all debate attacks the motive of his opponent instead of answering his arguments. All savages know the origin and destiny of man. About other things they know but little. The theologian is much the same. The Agnostic has given up the hope of ascertaining the nature of the 'First Cause,' the hope of ascertaining whether or not there was a 'First Cause.' He admits that he does not know whether or not there is an infinit being. He admits that these questions cannot be answered, and so he refuses to answer. He refuses also to pretend. He knows that the theologian does not know, and he has the courage to say so.

"He knows that the religious creeds rest on assumption, supposition, assertion—on myth and legend, on ignorance and superstition, and that there is no evidence of their truth. The Agnostic bends his energies in the opposite direction. He occupies himself with this world, with things that can be ascertained and understood. He turns his attention to the sciences, to the solution of questions that touch the well being of man. He wishes to prevent and to cure diseases, to lengthen life, to provide homes and raiment and food for man, to supply the wants of the body.

"He also cultivates the arts. He believes in painting and sculpture, in music and the drama—the needs of the soul. The Agnostic believes in developing the brain, in cultivating the affections, the tastes, the conscience, the judgment, to the end that man may be happy in this world. He seeks to find the relations of things, the condition of happiness. He wishes to enslave the forces of nature to the end that they may perform the work of the world. Back of all progress are the real thinkers, the finders of facts, those who turn their attention to the world in which we live. The theologian has never been a help, always a hindrance. He has always kept his back to the sunrise. With him all wisdom was in the past. He appealed to the dead. He was and is the enemy of reason, of investigation, of thought and progress. The church has never given 'sanctuary' to a persecuted truth.

"There can be no doubt that the ideas of the Agnostic are gaining ground. The scientific spirit has taken possession of the intellectual world. Theological methods are unpopular to-day, even in theological schools. The attention of men everywhere is being directed to the affairs of this world, this life. The gods are growing indistinct, and like the shapes of clouds, they are changing as they fade. The idea of special providence has been substantially abandoned. People are losing, and intelligent people have lost, confidence in prayer. To-day no intelligent person believes in miracles—in a violation of the facts in nature. They may believe that there used to be miracles a good while ago, but not now. The 'supernatural' is losing its power, its influence, and the church is growing weaker every day.

"The church is supported by the people, and in order to gain the support of the people it must reflect their ideas, their hopes and fears. As the people advance the creeds will be changed, either by changing the words or by giving new meanings to the old words. The church, in order to live, must agree substantially with those who support it, and consequently it will change to any extent that may be necessary. If the church remains true to the old standards then it will lose the support of progressive people, and if the people generally advance the church will die. But my opinion is that it will slowly change, that the minister will preach what the members want to hear, and that the creed will be controlled by the contribution-box. One of these days the preachers may become teachers, and when that happens the church will be of some use."

"What do you regard as the greatest of all themes in poetry and song?"

"Love and death. The same is true of the greatest music. In 'Tristan and Isolde' is the greatest music of love and death. In Shakspere the greatest themes are love and death. In all real poetry, in all real music, the dominant, the triumphant tone is love, and the minor, the sad refrain, the shadow, the background, the mystery, is death."

"What would be your advice to an intelligent young man just starting out in life?"

"I would say to him: 'Be true to your ideal. Cultivate your heart and brain. Follow the light of your reason. Get all the happiness out of life that you possibly can. Do not care for power, but strive to be useful. First of all, support yourself so that you may not be a burden to others. If you are successful, if you gain a surplus, use it for the gain of others. Own yourself and live and die a free man. Make your home a heaven, love your wife, and govern your children by kindness. Be good-natured, cheerful, forgiving, and generous. Find out the conditions of happiness, and then be wise enough to live in accordance with them. Cultivate intellectual hospitality, express your honest thoughts, love your friends, and be just to your enemies.'"

In his waning years Colonel Ingersoll, the silver-haired and silver-tongued, is nothing if not satirical and his coming lecture on "The Bible," which he expects to deliver in all sections of the Union and, perhaps, in Europe, will be the most pungent and radical of all his assaults on the works of the Old and New Testaments.

Convention of the Canadian Secular Union.

As stated last week in our News Column, the annual convention of the Canadian Secular Union was held in Toronto on September 7th, 8th, and 9th. We summarize below the full report of its proceedings contained in Secular Thought of Sept. 15th.

The convention assembled in the rooms of the Toronto Secular Society, the Forum, Friday evening, Sept. 7th. The president of the Canadian Union, our good friend, Capt. R. C. Adams, presided. The attendance was not quite so large as on some former occasions, but when enthusiasm and substantial results are considered, the convention was the most successful of recent years. After a solo by Mr. Ed Andrews, President Adams called the convention to order and, following a few preliminary remarks, read an address in which he said:

It is the custom once in a year to take the reckoning, verify positions, survey the past, and plan for the future. We hav met here to tell of the work of the past year, to sum up the progress of the cause, and to refresh our zeal and encourage our hopes by mutual conference. Our secretary, Mr. Ellis, will tell us of the status of our paper, Secular Thought, and others will narrate the progress in their localities and inform us regarding the outlook for reform. As president, I will giv a record of the efforts put forth for the advancement of Secularism. When I assumed the presidency of the Canadian Secular Union I took up, as the special work by which I desired to signalize my term of office, the reform of the oaths laws of Canada. Last year the right of affirmation was obtained under the Dominion laws for all who hav conscientious scruples against the taking of an oath. I would urge every Secularist, for the sake of example, to take advantage of this right. I hoped to be able to tell you this year that the same change had been secured for the province of Quebec, which now refuses to the unbeliever the right either to take the oath, make affirmation, or giv evidence in a court of justice. A reform measure, defeated last year through the opposition of the attorney general, will next winter come before the legislature, and we hav strong hopes of success.

While Secularism teaches the consideration of man's welfare in this world and the ignoring of other worldliness, the proselytism of the church and its aggressions upon the equal rights of the citizen necessitate that we combine attacks upon supernatural religion with our positiv work for human advancement. We see that the social and economic evils of the present time depend largely for their support upon certain teachings of the Bible as interpreted by the Christian church. What there is of good in the church we will conserve, but we cannot be blind to her failings, and we must antagonize her wherever we find her obstructing the development of humanity. As she receives police and fire protection from the state she should pay taxes upon her property. Her ministers must cease to monopolize fifty-two days in the year by shutting up museums, art galleries, libraries, places of entertainment, and preventing travel on Sunday. They must cease their attempts to suppress the Sunday paper by law. It is because the Sunday paper is more interesting than the sermon that the clergy try to stop its publication. The church multiplies its meetings on week evenings in order to thwart the desire of the people for other occupation or recreation. It demands recognition in birth, marriage, and death. In the province of Quebec it opposes civil registration; a child is not deemed to hav been born unless a clergyman certifies to the fact, and a marriage without his blessing is illegal. Woman is degraded by the restrictions and teachings of the church; tyranny finds its chief support in its edicts of submission to the powers that be; its preaching of contentment and alliance with the master hav kept the masses in subjection, and its proclamation of eternal woe has caused untold agony. By the proclamation of belief in miracle and special creation it has fostered weakness and dependence and been the greatest foe of science. The progress of modern times is coincident with the emancipation of society from ecclesiastical domination and the substitution of reason for dogmatic faith as a guide in practical life.

To destroy the hold of the church upon the minds of the people it is not only necessary to disprove its dogmas, but we must supplant its influence by supplying to the people in improved form such of its ordinances as are useful and hav become endeared by habit to the people. Among the most important of these are the weekly meeting and Sunday instruction for the young. It is a vital question—How shall we gratify the established taste for Sunday gatherings and giv the people something better than church diversions? To the majority of its attendants the church is even now only a religious fun club; but we must win them to a fun club that will not insidiously conspire against the political and mental liberties of mankind.

It is not necessary to dwell upon the importance of sustaining our paper and sending out lecturers and literature. These are the established means of effort. It is gratifying to notice how, through the enlightenment gained by education and the general diffusion of scientific knowledge, the principles of Secularism are rapidly spreading in harmony with the spirit of the age and are slowly but surely undermining the altar and the throne.

We, the Secularists of Canada, should arouse ourselvs from our present indifferent submission to churchly bondage and resolve that the legal and social power of the minister of supernatural religion shall be destroyed; that we shall so labor that the men of this country shall cease to entertain the sophistries of theology and become emancipated from those cruel superstitions which in the past hav shed gloom upon the life of men and barred the path of progress with torch and ax.

Upon the call of the president, the secretary, Mr. Ellis, gave an account of the work carried on in Toronto. He thought the Freethinkers were recovering somewhat from the inactiv condition in which the departure of Mr. Watts had left them. There had been a successful season the past year; the debating club had held twenty-six sessions and had discussed a wide range of subjects; members had prepared a large number of original essays; a singing class had been carried on and it was intended to hold concerts during this season; the fortnightly socials had been very successful and would be continued; Sunday evening meetings had been kept up until hot weather; two or three theological debates had been held. Altogether, the season's work had been permanently successful, and for the first time in several years there was a surplus in the hands of the treasurer.

The committee appointed at the last convention to form a burial club had met and organized the club. A considerable amount of literature had been printed and issued recently. There had been a perceptible improvement in public sentiment regarding Freethinking and Freethinkers, evidences of which were to be seen in the facts that the hall engaged for the Sunday evening meeting was refused to them only two years ago, and that most of the daily papers had contained notices of the convention.

Messrs. Ellis, Pringle, Kendall, and Lemay and Miss Ellis were appointed a committee on resolutions. The committee on Secular Thought was composed of Messrs. Wilson, Bourne, Johnston, Miss Sanderson, and Mrs. Densmore. Mr. Andrews gave another piano solo and then the hall was cleared for dancing, in which the evening was spent pleasantly. Refreshments were served at 11:30 and dancing continued until about 1 o'clock.

SATURDAY EVENING.

Captain Adams in the chair. Music by Mr. Andrews. Next the secretary read letters from absent friends, among whom were Charles Watts, Judge Charles B. Waite, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Dr. E. B. Foote, George E. Baxter, J. B. Thibaudeau, F. H. Denton, and Charles Etler. The last-named gentleman wisely observed that the great Secular drift of modern times has been the result of the two factors of the Bible and education, and it had its sure genesis in the outrageous demands made by the whole book upon the whole man. In fact, the "inspired word" is that double-edged "sword of the Lord" whose function it is to cut Christians into Secularists and fanatics.

Captain Adams spoke feelingly of the brave men and women who had written the letters, and of whose sympathy and support the Canadians should be proud. He then announced the next order of business—the election of officers for 1894–5. He said that he had completed the work that he had mapped out when elected four years ago; that he now had a great deal of important business to attend to, which required his whole attention, and he would be unable to devote to the office in the future the energy which should be given to it. It was unwise to force one man to fill the office for so many years; other men should be called upon to take a share in the activ work, and he must decline to allow his name to be submitted as a candidate. Several gentlemen who were nominated for the office of president declined for various reasons, and finally Captain Adams allowed his name to stand, on the understanding that at the next election one of the nominees should replace him, and he was then re-elected by acclamation. Then the other officers were elected, as follows:

First Vice-President—Allen Pringle, of Selby.
Second Vice-President—D. Densmore, of Toronto.
Third Vice-President—W. G. Hay, of Listowel.
Secretary—J. S. Ellis, of Toronto.
Treasurer—A. Earsman, of Toronto.
Executiv Committee—Geo. Martin, Montreal; Mr. Lookie, Waterloo; Mr. Wilson, Attwood; W. Algie, Alton; Mr. H. Falconer, W. Johnson, John Taylor, Mr. Lemay, and Miss Sanderson, Toronto.

Mr. Firth then read his paper on "The Religion of Humanity Compared with Christianity." Following this vigorous essay the president formally adjourned the convention till Sunday morning, the members remaining for an hour or so and taking part in an informal concert and entertainment.

SUNDAY MORNING.

On taking the chair shortly after 10 o'clock, the president called for the report of the committee on resolutions, which were read and submitted seriatim.

In reference to the engagement of a lecturer, it was suggested that an effort be made to induce Charles Watts to return to Canada, but after discussion it was generally conceded that the financial difficulties in the way are too great. The question of literature for distribution came up. Miss Hepburn said that it was important that the pamphlets be of a very simple character. Mr. Ellis made a financial statement regarding the condition of Secular Thought, and showed that some increased and organized effort would be necessary to enable the paper to be continued in its present shape. Sufficient assistance had been promised to insure the continued existence of the paper, but he wished to maintain it at its present standard, if not to raise it to a higher one. Correspondence revealed, he said, that the present state of things was in a large measure due to the almost universal financial depression. He had personally lost a large sum in issuing the paper and incurred a heavy liability and could go no further. Unless the Union supported the work more liberally than during the past year a change would be necessary. William McDonnell said that while such immense sums were given to maintain superstitious organizations of all sorts, surely the Freethinkers could easily maintain one paper. Captain Adams said that he would himself giv $25 and would collect $100 in Montreal. In a few minutes signatures were obtained to pledges for $240.

Mr. Hugh Falconer read the next paper, which was on "The Church in Politics in Ontario." There is no state church in Ontario, and no discrimination between sects. But the purely secular functions of the state are diverted into establishing and sustaining a multiplicity of religious factions in the country. The functions of the church are distinct from those of the state. If the church can be justified in regulating the temporal affairs of the state then the state is justified in regulating the religious belief of the nation. Such a system destroys all mental freedom and abolishes the right of free inquiry and investigation. Says Macaulay: "It is unquestionable and a most instructiv fact, that the years during which the Anglican hierarchy were in the zenith, were precisely the years during which national virtue was at the lowest point." Other authorities were quoted. Not only is the evidence of modern history against the assumption that the church wields an influence for good when permitted to control any of the functions of the state, but there is abundant confirmatory evidence in the as yet brief history of Canada. The affirmation in the British North American act, which constituted the Dominion of Canada, of the privileges which the church had enjoyed prior to confederation, was undoubtedly the greatest mistake in the constitutional history of Canada. The granting of the privilege of state-sustained denominational education has been the one bulwark behind which the old hostil feeling between the two races in British North America hav intrenched themselvs and prevented a free and full assimilation of the two races into one common nationality. After advancing many sound arguments on the educational question, Mr. Falconer came to the subject of state-supported religious charitable institutions. According to official report there are ninety such in the province of Ontario alone, drawing from the provincial government $165,000 annually. The other customary violations of the principles of the Demands of Liberalism were pointed out and forcibly condemned. The largest Christian denominations hav direct representation in the Canadian Parliament. What should we think of a joint stock company or a bank which should elect its board of directors in nicely proportioned representation from the different creeds of its stockholders? There are over $6,000,000 in exempted church property in the city of Toronto alone. This is exclusiv of cemeteries, private schools, hospitals, and all other so-called charitable institutions. The church should be sternly driven from politics. Its recognition tends to create selfish and jealous feelings in the country, embitters the daily relations of the people, intensifies sectarian rivalry for office and pelf, retards civilization, and in every way proves a detriment to the progress and happiness of the race.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

Mr. Drummond read a paper on "The Physical Basis of Morals." All nature teaches morals to the thinking mind by the expansion of the best of two activ but contrary principles linked together, growing together in its life. The tree grows in strength of trunk and beauty of top; what it gains in size of trunk in the dense forest it loses in beauty of its top; what it loses of trunk in the open field, it gains in beauty of branching and outline of top. We take advantage of this dual action in raising animals, and thus we may raise horses for either speed or draught; neither action is wrong; we only vibrate the heredity of the animal. So with man; he is born out of a sleep into waking; these alternate conditions make one phase of his character; neither is wrong, but too much of either is wrong. He must form his judgment from a consideration of the service of the two natural conditions in harmony. What is true of these twin functions of sleeping and waking is true of all his other functions. All his actions are right or wrong according to circumstances. The judgment should not be overbalanced by the exercise in unsuitable circumstances of a generally good principle. There is in human nature a continual pendulum action between two linked conditions or principles. The swing to each side ought to be equal in force, and alternate. All law is wrong which is single in assertion and command, and the more we see natural law and discover it we will find that duality of law exists for acceptance of best conditions; it is a principle of nature's law everywhere, and society's law ought, when formulated, to be dual, and is right only when judgment is given by a complementary law also. The evolution works in moral law as in physical law, or reversion makes perversion. No law can properly be pushed to an extreme.

SUNDAY EVENING AT THE AUDITORIUM.

Captain Adams opened with a few remarks on Secularism, which, he said, meant attending to the things of this world. Mr. Moffatt gave a short address in which he pointed out some of the absurdities of the Bible story. William Algie then talked about "Chips and Cinders," classifying the political, social, commercial, and theological worlds as a forest of trees in all stages of growth and decay. The human family were all prisoners in chains of limitations, and were all entitled to extend those limitations. After speaking of the old political trees of Canada, he came to the American Protectiv Association tree, which he said was a bad tree planted in bad soil. Was it a tree or fungus? Its creed was of the narrowest. The theological forest was badly mixed; it was hard to fix the labels. He did not find any essential difference between the Catholic and the Protestant trees. The Protestant church was not such a solid combination as the Roman church or some of those there would be prominent figures in a fire on the square outside. He preferred the Quebec Catholic Sunday to the Toronto Protestant Sunday. The Salvation Army tree was the illegimate child of emotionalism and the indifference of the wealthy classes to the interests of the poor. The Secular tree had spread its seeds over all the churches. The social forest he did not find very promising. Envy had built up a system of caste. Hypocrisy was a fungous growth which should be got rid of, if possible. Parents should let their children be instructed in the functions of their own bodies, instead of letting them leave home to learn the lesson in the vilest dens. The Prohibition tree, although well watered, was stunted. The evil of intemperance probably could be lessened only by education and intelligence. In the woods of labor there were too many deceiving guide-posts. The greatest danger there was the demagog.

The convention was concluded with a stirring arraignment of the church by Captain Adams. Among the attendants, activ and enthusiastic, was Mr. John Groom, who has seen eighty-four years of good and earnest life.

News and Notes.

The series of Freethought meetings at Chicago preparatory to the Congress are now under full headway. I lectured last Sunday evening on "Evolution and Creation" and a fine audience was present. There was an excellent debate pro and con after the lecture; and interest in the great questions of liberty, science, and humanity is evidently aroused. These meetings will be a great help to our October gathering. If visitors are in the city I hope they will attend at 181 West Madison street, corner Halsted. Mrs. Freeman lectures next Sunday evening, September 23d, on "Science and Superstition" and on September 30th I shall probably lecture on "Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Freethought." On the first Sunday in October will be the Memorial meeting in honor of Gen. M. M. Trumbull, whose name is a shining one in the annals of reform. Franklin Steiner will be with us the third Sunday in October and at the Congress. Every day the outlook is more favorable for a rousing Congress. From Maine to California we receive encouraging letters.

E. A. Stevens occasionally drops into town from his busy labors. Whatever Stevens undertakes to do he does with all his might, be it Freethought or "Sapolio." He is continually on the go. I met him and Mrs. Stevens the other day on the street and he took me over to the Wabanse Club House, a famous place for the gathering of the clans and the Democratic war-horses, where receptions are given to the great leaders, and celebrations held of mighty victories. Stevens and Geo. L. Robertson foregather with these Jeffersonian standard bearers, and plant themselvs upon the democracy of Jackson. The club-house is a handsome building and has every facility for enjoyment; and I hav no doubt they hav gay and festiv times in these storied halls. The building, however, is not large enough for the increasing membership, and I understand they are to hav a much more gorgeous temple of political worship.

I met Captain Gordon here, formerly of the British army, who for gallant services was promoted from the ranks to an officer, which is something rare in the British army. At the famous battle of Alma by his desperate daring he recovered the colors, and for his splendid heroism was thus rewarded. He is from the Highlands of Scotland I believe, and he says the Highlands are the only place in the civilized world never trodden by a foreign foe. Even the Roman eagles stayed their flight over those magnificent hills. Captain Gordon is a Liberal and a Freethinker, although in early youth he was in the grim circle of Scotch Presbyterianism. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh and specially enjoyed the teaching of Professor Wilson, the great and wonderful "Christopher North" who certainly was one of the most unique, inspiring, and brilliant lecturers that ever occupied the chair of moral philosophy. Captain Gordon is full of reminiscences, and an hour's talk with him is profitably enjoyed.

We also visited the great Newberry Library, one of the best in the world, mainly a library for reference. It has a vast collection of the best scientific, medical, and historic works. It has a special department devoted to religion which I hope some day to ransack. The building is a noble structure. It occupies the spot where once stood the famous Ogden mansion, which in the midst of the mighty fire was the only building that stood intact. How wonderfully Chicago has grown since that time!

One of the veteran representativs of our cause from my own nativ state, writes me as follows about the Congress:

SUNAPEE, N. H.

Were I present at the Congress I should certainly giv my testimony for the extinction of superstition, and in defense of constitutional civil liberty, which is the liberty worth contending for. I send you my gift as an indication of sympathy. Let us hope that the gathering of the 26th, 27th, and 28th of October, 1894, will be memorable for its harmony and practical efficiency in discharging the work in hand.

Yours always in the cause of human enlightenment and liberation, WILLIAM C. STUROC.

My old friend, W. H. Pepper, of California, who has done so much for our work, writes as follows. I am sure his letter will be of the greatest interest to all those interested in human progress:

PETALUMA, CAL., Sept. 15, 1894.

S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: Yours of the 5th instant duly received. Inclosed find post-office money order for $5 contribution to the Freethought Federation Congress. Times here are very dull. The bottom has dropped ont of my business (fruit and tree growing). I am now seventy years old, and my life is drawing to a close. I hav now done my share for the benefit of coming generations; hav established a free kindergarten school to be conducted on secular lines. Religious instruction is prohibited The school is located in the central part of the town. I gave a $3,000 lot; $5,000 for the building, and $15,000 endowment fund. I believe that the most effectual way to eradicate superstition, ignorance, and poverty, is to place the little ones in training schools and drill them in habits of morality, industry, and economy. Secular training must supercede religious training before society will be much improved in right living.

Wishing you prosperity and happiness, I remain,

Yours truly, W. H. PEPPER.

It is an encouragement to receive a letter like the following from those whose life-labors are going on to the century goal:

I thank you for your kind invitation to be at the Congress, but when I tell yon that I am in my eighty-sixth year, and my wife in her seventy-eighth year, you must take the will for the deed, however much I regret it. Inclosed find our contribution for a little help. I wish we could giv a thousand times more for such a glorious cause—the emancipation of humanity.

Fraternally, A. C. LAKE.

Another writes:

I am an Infidel seventy-three years of age; hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator twenty years, and will continue to take them during life.

Inclosed find $2. The amount is small, but if all Freethinkers would assist it would require but little from each. Yours truly, D. M. WORLEY.

What we need more than all in Freethought are new recruits to take the place of these grand old veterans. We hope the coming Congress will enlarge our list of youthful members.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Freethought Federation—Treasurer's Report.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Will all the friends of Freethought throughout the country mail us the names of the Freethinkers that they know of in their vicinity? We desire to send them invitations to attend the coming Congress, and documents in order to arouse wider interest in our work. Let us hav the names at once. This is important. I wish to announce also that arrangements hav been made with the proprietor of the Gault House, a first-class hotel on the West Side for the accommodation of vistors to the Congress, and the Gault House will be the headquarters of the Congress. The accommodations of this hotel are ample. It is within two blocks of the hall, corner of West Madison and Clinton streets. The rates for all members of Congress are $1.50 per day, room and board. It is a good plan to hav the members of Congress as near together as possible, as this conduces to an agreeable, social life outside the sessions of the Congress. We can become much better acquainted; and this is one of the great benefits of the Congress.

The contributions this week show the lively interest in the Congress; and that undoubtedly many will be present. Remember that every gift, however small. counts for much when joined with the others. We need means to send out thousands of documents and it costs money for printing, postage, etc. We must keep people informed as to our work.

Observations.

A convention of German Roman Catholics has just been held in this city. It was called a Verein meeting, though it does not appear that the people were Turners. I notice the occasion for the reason that a delegate named Caspar, from Milwaukee, entered complaint that members of German Catholic societies were "not allowed enough of liberty; the young people were not permitted to go to balls and parties." Mr. Caspar was duly hissed down, and Delegate Fehling, from St. Louis, arose to confute his remarks. "It is not true," said Mr. Fehling, "that members of German Catholic societies are denied liberty in the matter referred to. Why," he continued, while his hearers applauded, "the young people may attend all the balls and parties that are good for them, provided they first get the consent of their priest." The proper place for a man of Mr. Fehling's temperament is in some austerely conducted penitentiary, from the confines of which he might sally forth at will to participate in all sorts of enjoyable doings, if he could get the warden's consent. That is the kind of liberty dreamed of in the Roman Catholic's philosophy, and for a person so far in arrears mentally as to be a Roman Catholic it is perhaps sufficient.

There are twenty thousand and six papers published in the United States, and within the past month all but the six hav returned thanks, on behalf of a harassed population, for the adjournment of the Fifty-third Congress. Simultaneously it is to be noted that the said newspapers and populace are engaged enthusiastically in nominating members for the Fifty-fourth. The editors of papers should know better than to encourage this sort of thing until their constituents hav recovered from the effects of the last Congress so far as to be able to pay up their subscriptions. As for the people, they appear to be voting drunk; they taper off their political sprees toward the big end and pass from one delirium to another with no interim between wherein to draw a sober economic breath. The excitement of the present campaign is not a new outbreak; it is the same old toot.

The suggestion of this journal that those who desire not to be mirepresented, after death, as to their opinions on the subject of religion, should record their views in a book and attach the same to their last will and testament, is worthy of serious thought. A plain repudiation of the fundamental whims of the popular superstition is not enough. I hav read somewhere that Thomas Paine was known to be an unbeliever in the Bible at the time he drew from it those arguments in "Common Sense" which giv the reader a tired feeling. If it had not occurred to Mr. Paine to publish his "thoughts on religion" as a last offering to his "fellow-citizens of all nations," the Sunday schools instead of the Freethought societies would in our day be celebrating the 29th of January. Lincoln, whose religious views are now in dispute, committed a great oversight in failing to "publish his thoughts." He appears to hav been a loquacious individual, always ready to giv the preachers a game of talk, and probably he fooled them into the belief that he agreed with them. But he did not try to fool "all the people all the time;" and that fact has given the clergy almost as much trouble as if he had written a Freethought library.
